ILLICK BELIEVES CHESTNUT BLIGHT MAY BE OVERCOME (Continued From Page 1)

"From the time the blight made its first appearance, however, there were a few believed that after the crest of destruction had passed a more hopeful outlook would develop. During the past twenty years I have watched the chestnut tree with the hope that in time we would see assuring evidence of its recovery. During the past three years an increasing number of reports have come to me from different sections of Pennsylvania stating that chestnut sprouts are becoming larger, and that nuts are again being produced in regions where they were entirely absent for five or more years.

"Personal observations throughout the State confirmed these reports and suggested the need for a special study of the chestnut situation. A preliminary study has accordingly been made and studies will continue until we know the true status of the chestnut blight in Pennsylvania. A report on the preliminary studies is being published and will soon be available for distribution.

"The crest of the chestnut blight was passed too recently to make positive predictions about its future development, but each year produces additional evidence indicating that this destructive disease has passed its climax in our State, and I continue to look forward with confident hope that the chestnut tree will slowly work its way back into Penn's Woods."

have been brought up to the standard set by the Commission, while fields not meeting the requirements have been wiped out by the Commission's refusal to license them. A total of 86 airports and landing fields had been issued by the Commission up to and including July 26. Some of these fields have been awarded full commercial licenses, which not only permits passenger carrying but flight instruction of students. Other licenses permit only the carrying of passengers with flight instruction eliminated. In addition to the field licenses 65 field certificates of qualifications and safety have been issued to airports and landing fields. This certificate evidences that the fields, planes and pilots are safe for the various activities on the fields.
