gauging the flow and studying the waste waters at each operating tannery in the State. Needed treatment works have been or will be installed at each.

Dr. Appel pointed out that because even harmless discharge from tanneries stain the stones in the stream below it, fishermen and other water lovers are quick to note the condition and report it. Dr. Appel explained that the seeming dark brown color of streams below tanneries is not due to the water but is reflected color from the stained stones on the bed of the stream. Although the water may be as pale as very weak tea the stained stones on the bottom give the stream the apparent color of very strong coffee. Removal of the color, once the discharge has been rendered harmless is not necessary but is, nevertheless, one of the objects which the present program hopes to attain, Dr. Appel said.

Avoid Puddles and Coccidiosis

By Prof. Walter B. Krueck

Placing the brooder house upon a heavy sod seems to help control and eliminate coccidiosis.

Even where sandy soils are used there is a tendency for the surface soil to become puddled close to the brooder houses where the chicks congregate. As a result of the stamping of this soil about the brooder house, puddles will form following most of our spring rains.

Professor Halpin at the University of Wisconsin Experiment Station placed chicks upon sandy soil that had not been used for poultry for a great many years. In less than five weeks an infection of coccidiosis appeared in the flock. In adjoining lots where good blue-grass sod was maintained, no difficulty was encountered.

As a result of the above experience, Professor Halpin would recommend that the brooder house be placed upon sod, even though the pullets are allowed to run into cultivated corn fields. Moving the brooder house often, also, will help keep a good sod around the brooder house where the chicks tend to congregate and will help to prevent the development of the disease.

As coccidiosis has been quite detrimental to growing pullets and also to pullets in the laying house during the winter months, an ounce of prevention here is worth a great many pounds of cure. A few minutes time in moving the brooder house often during the growing period will help to grow stronger, healthier and better pullets and make more profit for the farmer and the poultryman.
