PLAN WILL SPEED

from that point relayed back to district engineers, and field employees of the Sanitary Water Board. In many instances, by the time that investigations as to the condition of the water could be started, the pollution that had caused the death of a great many fish, had moved out of the reach of the investigators. The arrangement now in operation will result in the minimum loss of time between the discovery of dead fish and the investigation of the engineers of delays when reports from sportsmen and field officers of the Fish Commission were sent to Harrisburg, and the board.

To expedite this arrangement and make it most effective, field officers of the Board of Fish Commissioners have been furnished with a list, giving names and addresses of field engineers of the bureau, and in turn, the field engineers are under binding instructions to make immediate investigation of any condition reported to them by the employees of the Fish Commission. Not only will samples of the suspected poisonous water be examined at once in the chemical laboratories of the bureau, but when deemed advisable, large portions of the water will be taken to a State fish hatchery, for observation, by placing living fish in it, and noting the results in various dilutions. It is believed this new method will prove most effective in determining the causes of fish killing in Pennsylvania's streams.

Secretary Lewis stated that he intends to erect barricades at the beginning of operations and warn motorists that they must slow down while raveling those sections of the road which have been oiled. If the Highway Department is unsuccessful in eliminating this loss and motorists continue to disregard these instructions it may be necessary to block off the road entirely, causing lengthy detours in many instances. "I believe that a large percentage of the motorists will be pleased to accede to our requests that they slow down while passing over the sections which have been immediately oiled." Lewis said.
