fortunate retirement from active newspaper work, four or five years ago, we never thought of him as anything but a newspaperman and when we met him we waited impatiently until he had completed his discourse on tulips so we could get his opinion on any problem we had. Tulips, incidentally, became a feverish passion with Bill when he laid down his eye-shade. He seemed prouder of the silver bowls he won at flower shows than of those four-decked headlines he used to write without breaking the thought.

We can report now that Bill never did stop writing, even though what he wrote was not published. A friend told us this week that his family has a batch of copy which McCollum must have written from habit. Looking over it our friend found a piece Bill had
