JOHN JETER FAMILY MAKE TRIP TO HOME-STEAD IN VIRGINIA

Mr. and Mrs. John Jeter Jr., and daughter, Deborah, enjoyed a treat last week that only those of us who have the "antique bug" can appreciate. Mr. and Mrs. Jeter left Monday morning for Baltimore where they picked up Deborah, a student nurse at the Johns Hopkins Hospital, and then travelled south through Maryland and Virginia.

They visited a picturesque old village called Jetersville named for the venerable ancestors of John who lived there some 200 years ago. The high point of the trip came when they went through the old homestead of the original Jeters, a perfect specimen of old Southern architecture with its spotless wide floor boards and original stone fire-places just as they were built 200 years ago.

The Jeters were disappointed that they didn't have the time to go on some miles to the home built and occupied by John's Great Grandfather. The house they understand is still standing, but the grist mill and out-houses were destroyed by fire during the Civil War.
