Thomas Hardy used it well when speaking of war's brutality, he wrote: "Peace on earth," we sing it And pay a million priests to bring it, And after two thousand years of mass We've got as far as poison gas.

And since our column seems to have got out of hand and devoted itself to other people's writings we might close it with that clever bit of poetic satire which we printed so proudly for the first time last April, "Hexameters", by Miss Ruth Howell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Howell of Trucksville; Our God is merciful and Christ we adore And human sacrifices we piously abhor, "Thou shalt not kill," therefore, in retribution just, Who kills a man is to electrocution rushed, But mass production is our aim in life; Heroic is he who kills a thousand men in strife.

Cornelius J. Gallagher of 103 Butler Street, Kingston, has remodeled the house formerly occupied by G. R. Downer.

Mrs. Isobel Stephenson of West Centre and Ferguson Streets is grieving over the loss of "Spitz", the family's pet dog.

William Brown of Perrin Avenue is entertaining people from Wyoming. The license plates have a cowboy riding a wild horse, the character painted in canary on a black background.

Manager Evans of Kresge's 5 and 10 is now located on Pioneer Avenue near the Holcomb Farm. He formerly resided on West Centre Street and then moved to Jackson Township.

Ernest Keller, who has built houses on Roushey Street and Pioneer Avenue, is roofing and repairing the Smith residence on West Centre Street at the car station.

Pete Oberst still thinks ha Dallas has a future. Since his youth in Lake Township, Mr. Oberst has seen Dallas come up from a creek bed to a busy little town. The veteran barber lives near Fernbrook Park and operates his shop in the basement of the Sullivan building on Main Street.

Since the World Series, talk of championship ball does not enter into the game much. The series was at all times in the hands of Jimmie Ripple but the manager of the Giants did not play it that way. Even the Italian hit a homer into the left field stands. Ripple, in a deep right field, with any kind of intelligent pitching, could have caused a Giant's victory in at least four of the seven games of the series.

There has been considerable talk regarding the custom of sending our football team in the township against higher class teams. Our boys are smarter than the other fellows, we admit, but all those bumps don't do us any good. It is all right while you're young to take the bumps, but they add up, and after you're grown you begin wondering what's the matter with you.

The other day while we were passing John Mould's place, below Mt. Greenwood, we heard a great bang, which must have awakened Mr. Mould's new twin babies from a sound sleep. And then we saw a yellow wheeled sedan, all crippled, crawl on down to Asa Shaver's home.

It seems that Asa wasn't home. Maybe he was down at Woolbert's, recounting the different bargains which he got in his palmy days. Anyhow, as we arrived, still on foot, three young ladies climbed out of the car. One of them asked us if we could jack the car up. She said she could change the tire herself, if only the wheel was off the ground.

The car itself was now pretty nearly flat on the ground on Asa's lawn, and to get a jack under the axle was like trying to give a hypodermic to a cockroach that couldn't stand up.

But we took the jack, connected the rod and shoved it ahead under the car, and when it struck something we went to work jacking up whatever would come up. Pretty soon we heard a cracking and splitting, so we got up to see how a car could make a noise like timber breaking.

We had jacked Asa Shaver's porch up about a foot. We were too strong for any car hoisting, so we flagged Cobleigh's truck, which was passing, and the driver sent his helper up for his own jack. Just then Tom Reese came along and we figured we'd better turn the job over to the others.

High school football fans celebrated the victory over Forty Fort long and loudly. Not once, but three times, the local boys had the courage and skill to cross the Forty Fort goal line. Hicks' team simply outclassed and outgassed Forty Fort.

I'm a funny sort, but a darned good sport

When the boys come home all happy, You can see me smile, for it's quite awhile Since I've seen young boys play snappy!

And it's tickling so, from head to toe, And it seems that we've gone daffy, Oh, it's a bonny lot, that the township's got, They made Forty Fort bawl calfy.

Yes, it's a bright, great day, All along our way, The fort is called just Forty, It's the time of year When the world looks drab, But we are gay and sporty.

We can light a flare, Where the trees are bare And try Lyne through right side tackle.

You may find the path, Such as Wilson bath, And where Isaacs came to unshackle.

Friends or Quakers, generally associated with the Philadelphia area, were holding regular meetings in the Gramplan Hills of Central Pennsylvania as early as 1811.

A bushel of flax seed cost a dollar in Central Pennsylvania a century ago. The demand was keen, as settlers depended on flax for their clothing.

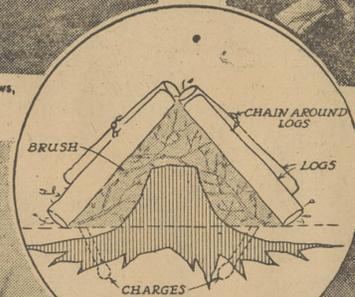

Blasting in the Barnyard - How to Remove Stumps Close to Adjacent Buildings

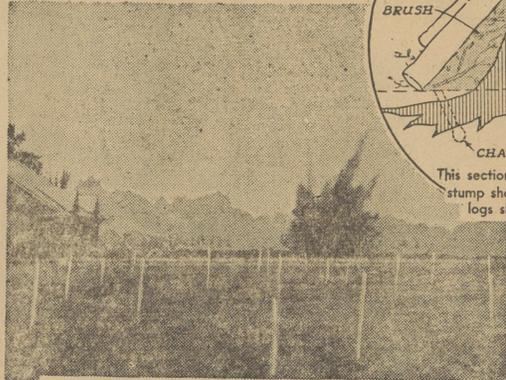

These stumps, hard by a barn with many windows, presented a peculiar problem.

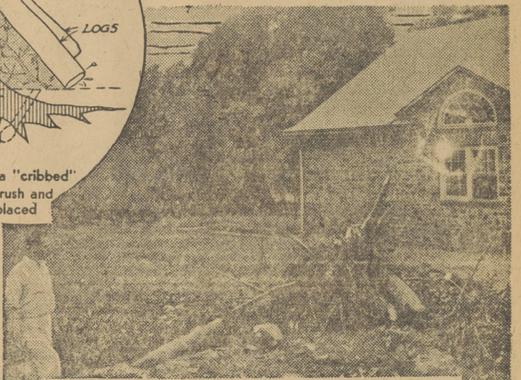

Building a "crib" to confine the blast. L. F. Livingston, at the right, fastens the chain.

This section through a "cribbed" stump shows how brush and logs should be placed

The blast! Note how close buildings are to the explosion.

The stump turned up neatly, without damage to the wall nearby. The "crib" prevented any flying debris.

WHEN a stump is close by a building, its removal with dynamite presents a peculiar problem. There is, however, according to L. F. Livingston, manager of the Agricultural Extension Section, E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Company, a safe and easy method to blast without injury to adjacent structures. The method is called by Mr. Livingston "stump cribbing," and an experienced blaster, using the proper procedure, can take out a stump within twenty feet of a wall.

The stump is first loaded, the charge being placed about twenty-five per cent deeper than ordinarily, and a heavier charge used. Care should be taken, however, not to overload.

To build the crib, Mr. Livingston covers the stump with a pile of brush, preferably small tree limbs still retaining their leaves. Pyramided about the brush, forming a rough cone, are logs, long enough to completely cover the mound. A heavy chain or a steel cable, its ends fastened securely, is then looped loosely around the logs, holding them together. There must be enough brush to keep the logs twelve inches or more away from the stump.

The charge is then exploded, and if properly done should turn the stump out of the ground with no flying debris, the protective logs being propelled a few feet in the air and dropping harmlessly.

Dynamite has two actions, Mr. Livingston points out, the breaking action, which is very rapid, and the heaving action, which is comparatively slow. The crib fulfills two functions. First, the brush serves as a cushion to absorb the shock of the breaking action, so that only the "heave" is applied to the mass of logs. Second, the weight of the logs confines the blast, preventing the heaving action from tossing the stump into the air. The chain is not broken.

"The problem of blasting close to a building is on two sides," Mr. Livingston says. "Damage may result from pieces flying through the air, or from ground shock cracking the foundations. The distance at which this method may be used varies, of course, with the condition of the ground and the formation of the building. In general, it must be remembered that wet soil will transmit a shock wave from an explosion through the earth farther than dry soil. Rock will carry it even farther, and care should be taken to see that rock on which the foundation may rest does not extend out just beneath the stump.

"A building on pillar foundations, such as may be found on many farms, offers an easy problem. Successful crib blasts have been made within six feet of such a structure."
