When things were at their blackest a paternal Federal administration conceived public relief for America. If ever a town needed such aid, this one did, and the people grasped eagerly at the manna from Washington, obediently bartering their political beliefs for bread and butter.

Before long the government was pumping badly-needed money into the little community. True, individually it amounted to little more than enough to keep body and soul together, but many had scarcely been able to do that. Today, we are told, three-fourths of the residents of this community are dependent upon government relief.

Obviously, these people could not be left to starve. Their situation was not of their own making. Even now, few of them enjoy being helped by the government, and many of them resent the political aspect of their relief jobs. When they can, they find jobs elsewhere and move. It appears that the community is, unless something unforeseen steps in to check the decline, to become a ghost town.

Yet, day after day, more relief funds pour in. The community has two swimming pools, one of them finer than anything in Wyoming Valley. Government funds have built tennis courts, a new community building, an annex to the school. Everywhere one sees civic improvements which would be welcomed enthusiastically by any growing, progressive community. Perhaps the crowning achievement in the effort to find work for the surplus of relief effort is the improvement of a highway into a neighboring farming valley. The new road is being built by hand labor. It will cost several million dollars. It will lead from this community to a valley which probably has a total population of 300 souls.

We cannot help but wonder who will use these fine buildings, these swimming pools and roads, who will go to these schools or attend these free WPA music classes in the future. Not the young people who look forward to the day when they can move away. Not new residents, surely, for there is certainly no attraction now for immigrants.

Unless the government finds some answer better than WPA this town must slowly die, and every bit of the millions of dollars spent here will be lost. That is a frightful thought, and a bitter reflection upon the vision and wisdom of our so-called enlightened democracy.

We merely present the problem as we have found it here this week. We wish we knew the answer. It does seem to us that the money which is being spent here might be invested more wisely—if not in re-opening the mines, in the establishment of some other needed industry which would check the town's decline, make these fine people self-supporting again, and give the government some chance for a return on its investment. That, we suppose, is socialism. It is also logic.
