The next day the first leaf fell. It groaned weakly and then it went, sliding and slipping through the air, taking an interminably long time to reach the earth. It was sad, but there was something lovely about the way it floated slowly downward. And the little maple leaf, knowing the time had come, tightened his grasp on his limb and prayed for strength.

After that the rains came, hard, cold, driving rains that tore his brothers from their limbs and packed them deeply below. The very little maple leaf was soggy and very miserable, but he clung fiercely, and when the rains stopped after three days he was still hanging to his limb, and there weren't very many of his brothers left now.

The wind came and tossed him about violently, and it took every bit of strength and will power to keep his hold, but he did. One day it snowed a little, and he almost forgot his misery, watching the lazy flakes.

There was a day when two lovers walked through the woods, hand in hand, and the girl, whose cheeks were reddened by the wind and whose eyes were sparkling, pointed to the little maple leaf and called him "a brave little fellow." That helped.

But he knew he could not last much longer. He ached all over from holding so tightly. "Why don't you go, my son?" his mother asked one day. "You suffer so much."

"No, mother," the little maple leaf answered. "I have decided to be the last leaf in the world to go. I must be sure that the others have fallen."

That night he asked the wind, as it went rushing by. "Wind, is there any leaf anywhere that has not fallen?"

The wind went away in a burst of speed and when it came back the next night it told him. In all the world, no leaf had survived the cold and the rain and the frosts. The little maple leaf was alone. Then he knew his time had come.

"I am the only leaf left, Mother," he said, "and now I am going."

His mother looked at him proudly. Her voice was sad. "Next year, when the leaves come again," she said, "I shall tell them of you and they will make a song about you. Go now, very little leaf, and God bless you."

The very little maple leaf took one last look about him. The world was brown and dead and there was no friend left to say good bye.

He was alone. One lonely leaf, of the countless trillions which had rustled and whispered here such a short time ago. He was so tired, so awfully tired. He wanted so much to rest his stem, which ached from holding so tightly.

He shook his points weakly. "Good by, mother," he said. "Good by, son," the mother called back, sleepily.

And then the little maple leaf slipped away from his limb and fluttered down and down and down until he settled softly among his brothers—and it was Winter.

solid and immediate hope that more and need, lies with the store method of distribution. With maximum economies it is fair to say the store price of milk would be at least four cents under the home delivered price and at least two cents under any home delivered price that is remotely possible.

"It looks like a deadlock," Fortune concludes. "And so, for the moment, it is. But it is a deadlock that is ready to be resolved, and the speed at which this foreseeable unwinding will proceed is largely up to the consumer."
