But on top of all that, one of the last phone calls I received at The Post was from a lady whose name and address had appeared in the social column. "Young man," she said, her voice shaking with emotion. "I live in Dallas, not Fernbrook." Well, that was that.

One of my pet reforms was the construction of a centralized sewage system for Dallas and Kingston Township. I wrote long and involved technical articles on the benefits of a centralized sewage system. I spoke to the proper authorities and helped provoke the annual Action against the haphazard sewage disposal means of Dallas.

I even ran what I thought would be a community eye-opener, and the clinching argument for The Post's campaign for better sewer systems—a cut of a sewer pipe emptying into Toby's Creek, spreading contamination and shame for all to see.

But I made the mistake of labelling it "A Dallas Garden Spot," and the accompanying caption was just too, too facetious. Much of the detail I had planned on showing—tin cans, the sewer pipe itself, and a few other unsanitary items—didn't appear clearly enough in the picture. As a matter of fact, the whole effect was rather nice and the paper received, if I recall correctly, numerous communications complimenting it on a vivid example of the sylvan beauty which is one of Dallas' best assets.

No one could say I didn't try, anyway.

The sidewalk situation will, I suppose, be taken care of the time under the auspices of the WPA.

Postscripts

About all I could do to promote that was to write stirring stories on the progress of the latest project. I wish the sidewalk committee would take cognizance of conditions on Lehman Avenue, however. I got my feet wet walking into the office this afternoon.

I never knew enough about The Post's plans for a centralized police system to write anything about it, one way or the other. In fact, all I know about the police force to this day is that if Chief Stevenson doesn't catch speeders at Harvey's Lake, Pop Covert will. And if he misses up, one of the Kingston Township gendarmes will do the honors.

All other matters of more importance have always received the cooperate action of the police hereabouts, and why say changes should be made, at least until a real crime wave comes to town, is more than I know. But that line about centralized police forces looks very nice in the masthead, and it may stay there from now until doom's day, as far as I'm concerned.

When I spoke in guarded tones about taking politics out of local school systems, I merely took the masthead at its word that the situation was acute. And, subsequently, the more I looked into local school affairs and became acquainted with the school board members, the less case I could build up.

In fact, the only real stand, as far as I can recall, that I took in the school situation related to the old Goss Manor school house. A young matron of Dallas Township just to understand that conditions in the building weren't all they should be.

I wrote a story about it, and the very next day Chris Eipper came to see me. The school board didn't have enough money to build a new school house, Civic Program or no Civic Program, and that's all there

SWEET VALLEY

Christmas exercises will be held at the First Christian Church, where Rev. Ira Button is pastor, on Saturday night. The choir will sing a special program and the children of the Sunday School will have a part in the festivities. Santa Claus will make a personal appearance.

McKinley Long, who has been ill, is about again.

The parsonage of First Christian Church has been renovated and makes a fine appearance.

has now become a matter of course, I suppose that the men who follow Rees and myself will interview them again and again in the years to come.

I wrote the Dallas Junior Women's Club, of the Franzes and Hildebrandts and Roods and Shavers and Olivers and Schooleys and Conyngthams and Majors, of Old Dallas institutions, of new Dallas institutions, of the hopes and fears of local businessmen, of the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars and Rotarians and Kiwanians, of the passing of the street cars and coming of the buses, of the PTA's and alumni associations, of Pete Oberst's barber shop and Hayden's bar, of churches and schools, of young people and old people.

I wrote of Dallas. I wrote The Post. I think I wrote just enough to qualify as a country newspaperman, and at least a near approximation of a Postscripter. I wrote next to Rees. I wrote next to Riskey. And I wrote next to that pine tree and the split-rail fences . . . but I've written so much to justify myself as a guest columnist that I'll have to postpone my own whimsical philosophy until next week.

I stayed long enough to see both come to pass, but as soon as I left I learned that the Dallas to Tunkhannock highway was to avoid Dallas entirely. Fine stuff. That shows how things can go all to hell if you don't keep at them. When I think that I could have saved that part of The Post's program from the fate it has now met by concentrating on it, my blood boils. But what's done is done . . .

The more I think about it, the more I realize that I didn't come to be the Voice in this community that I had hoped to become. But I maintain that in other respects I upheld the traditions of The Post and the trust its publisher put in me.

I wrote in glowing terms of Col. Reynolds' live-stock sales—a custom which I took on when I came, and one which has survived my regime. I interviewed, as others had before me, all the likely old characters hereabouts. Since their longevity
