so his rule was almost absolute. It was not just that men owed their livelihood to him. It was that they scarcely ever crossed the boundaries of his empire. Quite likely, they lived in a company house. At dawn, they went into his mines to turn black diamonds into hard cash for him. They bought mining drills and beds and woolen socks and sharp cheese in his four-story company store at Market Street and Page Avenue. If, as was quite unlikely, they had anything left after their store bill, rent and mining supplies had been deducted from their wages, they entrusted it to Mr. Edwards' bank.

In those days of Kingston's business section extended from Kingston Corners to the D. L. & W. railroad station and in its middle, at the intersection of Market, Page and Chestnut, was the nerve center of Mr. Edwards' industrial system. On one corner there was the bank. Opposite was the company store. Up the street a short way was the ivy-covered building of Kingston Coal Co. Every day, harried clerks shuffled back and forth feverishly from one of these buildings to another, bent on Mr. Edwards' business.

About this hub of commerce sprawled one of the wealthiest sections in the valley, an area whose good fortune was rivalled only by the gold coast along Wilkes-Barre's river bank. Within a space of four blocks there were a score of pretentious mansions, presided over by families whose names carried weight in banking circles throughout the State. There were fabulous stories told of the goings-on in the elegant homes of those coal barons.

By the time our family had moved into that thin atmosphere the glamour was beginning to wear off. Mr. Edwards' Middle European immigrants were overflowing the railroad tracks. Clouds of smoke from the roundhouse made housewives' lives miserable. And men had learned that by organizing they could gain strength to break uncomfortable bonds. Still strong at his death, Mr. Edwards' empire was undergoing a kind of social revolution.

Most of the old families stayed loyal to their particular bit of God's earth, though. A few of them still cling to lonely mansions. One of Mr. Edwards' three daughters fled to aristocratic Montclair, N. J. Another retreated from her turreted castle and spent the lonely last days of her life drinking champagne and dining occasionally from gold service in a modest white home a block away. A grandson held the fort-like brick mansion at Maple Street for a while, but he finally left its stout brick stockade behind for a more rural environment at Harvey's Lake. One by one, Mr. Edwards' heirs migrated, until they were scattered across the world.

Trade at the company store shriveled, despite attempts at modernization. Finally, in desperation, some of the departments were pruned and the establishment was moved to Kingston Corners, but it never revived, and a few years ago it closed. Mr. Edwards' bank left the brown stone building and moved to a glistening new building on Wyoming Avenue, where it continues to flourish. Kingston

Sealed bids for the purchase of one or more or all of said bonds at not less than par and accrued interest, will be received by the secretary until 8 o'clock P. Any bid not accompanied by such check will not be considered.

Noxen Woman Called By Death

Mrs. Maude Coolbaugh Was Buried Yesterday

A six-month illness ended in death for Mrs. Maude Coolbaugh, 42, Noxen, on Monday night. Her passing grieved innumerable friends who knew her as a devout Christian of cheerful and kindly disposition.

Mrs. Coolbaugh was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Wright of Noxen and had lived in that town all her life with the exception of 10 years spent in Wyoming Valley. She was a devout member of the Noxen Methodist Church.

Stricken about six months ago, she underwent a serious operation and seemed to recover some after it, but her condition has grown steadily worse in the last month. The funeral was held yesterday afternoon at 2 in Noxen Methodist Church. Rev. David Morgan, pastor, and Rev. Harry Rundell of Noxen Tabernacle, officiated. Interment was in Orcutt Cemetery, Noxen.

Surviving are her husband, Ralph; two sons, Carl and Leon, and one daughter, Arlene, all at home; her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Wright; two sisters, Mrs. Edward Nafus, East Dallas, and Mrs. Gordon Johnson, Lehman Heights, and one brother, Ernest of Detroit.

Maurice J. Girton Is Laid To Rest

Funeral services were held on Saturday at St. Paul's Lutheran Church for Maurice J. Girton. Rev. Herbert E. Frankfort, pastor, officiated. Flower carriers were Burton Bonnell, Robert O'Boyle, William Snyder, Eugene O'Boyle and Kenneth Brace. Carriers were C. J. Eipper, Giles Wilson, Lloyd Drake, Gerald Snyder and Ronald Doll. Interment was in Bloomsburg.

Coal Co., bankrupted by the depression, is still searching for some way to re-open. The coal company's offices are empty, the four-story company store, shortened to one-story by a disastrous fire several years ago, is occupied by a cut-rate grocery and now the bank, proudest symbol of Mr. Edwards' fortune, is to be razed to save taxes.

We left the Second Ward of Kingston some years ago, and we seldom see it now unless we are on our way to catch a train. We never pass Jimmy Nesbitt's barber shop and the old bank and the old company store and Lohman's drug store, though, without a twinge of nostalgia. Time has dealt harshly with Daniel Edwards' empire, but there are ghosts who lurk before the unlighted windows of vacant store-rooms and one of them, we think, is the ghost of a kid we recognize.

A fragment of our own youth will go down with the bank, for we lived in its shadow for at least seven years. We had our first savings account there. In a fearful office on its second floor we braved our first dentist's drill. When the Masons had their smokers on the third floor, our orchestra used to play, not beautifully, perhaps, but earnestly. On summer evenings we played tag on the broad sidewalks in front of the bank, or roller-skated. And once, right in front of it, we were struck by an automobile and, by clutching a headlight and riding the bumper, escaped with no damage beyond a broken shoelace, although a maiden lady who was passing by insisted the sight had snipped 10 years from her life.

We don't know why, at this late date, we should be feeling sorry all of a sudden for Mr. Edwards. We've never had very much in common. But there are at least two of us—Mr. Edwards' ghost and your Post-scrippter—who are feeling badly about that old bank.

Tells Post Readers Of England's Christmas

Engineer on one of the ships the Graf Spee had sunk. His wife told me that she had come from her mother's home in Scotland only a few days before I saw her in order to get her house ready for the return of her husband at Christmas.

She was listening to the German radio when she heard for the first time that her husband's ship had been sunk. Can you imagine the hell she went through then—alone with her 13-year-old daughter? All that night she sat up listening to the radio and hoping for more news. And then the next day—the day I saw her—came a telegram from her mother in Scotland to say that her husband had cabled the news of his landing at Montevideo.

I am afraid the war at sea remains very remote to one until one meets someone who has suffered from it.

And now, cheerio until next week's Post.

Dying Man Calls Police; Trip To Hospital Futile

Stricken with apoplexy earlier in the day, John Hayes, 72, who lives alone on a farm at Idetown, phoned Harvey's Lake police Wednesday night last week when his condition became worse. He was taken to Wilkes-Barre General Hospital in the Harvey's Lake cruiser, but died at 7:35 Thursday morning.

Mr. Hayes, who was 72, had lived on a farm at Idetown for years. His nephew, William P. Gardner, Wilkes-Barre, found him lying unconscious on the floor in the afternoon. There was evidence that he had done his chores before Gardner arrived. Later that night Mr. Hayes called the police and asked them to take him to a hospital.
