Postscripts

preoccupied milkman, who stepped on Posty one morning while he was napping peacefully near the candy counter. That slowed Posty's reflexes considerably, and so when, a few hours later, he saw the foot of a second milkman headed for his mid-sector he couldn't dodge quickly enough, and Posty, minus one more of his lives, was transported to the Cheney home, for emergency treatment.

Misfortune continued to dog his steps though, and about the time he was beginning to show some interest in life again he was laid low by coal gas fumes. The Cheney's found him, limp and cold, on the cellar floor. They carried him tenderly to the back porch, to await interment on the following morning. But on the day of his own funeral, Postscripts, bleary-eyed but triumphant, was meowing for milk at the back door.

Now there were three lives gone, and six to go. After that Posty flourished for a while, and enjoyed peace. His sides became sleek and round, his tail grew to a fine length for swishing and he began to sport a natty collar, studded with brass. Before long, amidst general rejoicing, he was able to return to the Tally Ho, there to thrive upon attention and scraps of hamburger.

It was during this period of his life that Posty began to develop a philosophy of life. Reserved, moody, often lost in his own secret thoughts, he seemed content to live a lonely life. He would stalk majestically across the Tally Ho's new linoleum, ignoring all but those whom he admitted to his restricted circle. There was no question that Posty was destined to become a misogynist. Perhaps he would have preserved his new-found contentment if he had not wavered from that philosophy and fallen in love.

There is no doubt that Posty's courting days were happy ones. Life suddenly expanded for him. His tread was firm, his eyes had a strange, mystic light and he was affable and jovial even to customers with charge accounts. Posty's departure at twilight to keep his nightly tryst became a great event. Each morning he returned—each morning, that is, until the dread night when misfortune struck again.

This time it was an automobile. It caught Posty as he was crossing Main Street after a visit to his lady love. When they picked him up he had been knocked into a shape vaguely resembling an "L". We were on our vacation then, but the tragic word came to us, filled with the fear that Posty could not survive this latest disaster. But a gallant heart refused to stop beating, and when, in September, we returned to town, there was Posty to greet us. He still walked at right angles, but there were five lives left.

Somehow romance and automobile traffic became connected in Posty's mind, and he avoided both for several months. His aversion to romance dimmed first, for he began entertaining the A. & P.'s tabby—who lived on the same side of the street. But she was a proud creature, who spurned Posty's tender advances, and so he ended the affair in a huff and withdrew into his old shell.

His adventurous life left Posty with a framework scattered with weird-looking bumps and bulges, but these were scarcely less painful than the bruises he carries on his heart. Now, prematurely old, he lives with his memories, apparently convinced that life is a fickle thing, at best. From his vantage point behind the plate glass door at the Tally Ho he watches the current of life flow by. He has no desire now to throw himself into the stream. He prefers to observe—and philosophize about the foibles of the strange creatures who move about him.

In the tradition of bachelorhood, he was a way with children. A few months ago a soft-eyed, wistful-faced kitten—who has been named Victoria—came to share the Tally Ho's scraps with Posty. A sprightly minx who is never quiet, Victoria was frightened at first by Posty's sour visage, but one day a scrap of paper she was playing with slid across the floor to stop by Posty's feet. Victoria skidded to a stop, sat down and waited. Gruffly, Posty studied the paper. Then—and there are those who swear he grinned a little embarrassedly—he cocked a paw and shot the paper back at the surprised Victoria.

Since then, Victoria and Postscripts have been inseparable, each contributing something valuable to the other. Posty keeps a fatherly eye on the frowsome kitten while Victoria, who is scarcely more than a handful of soft, warm fur, amuses Postscripts with her crazy antics. She alone has the power to tease Posty out of his dark moods. Sometimes they play for hours, Victoria tumbling and scampering about, as fast as quicksilver, and Posty lumbers about awkwardly and with aching shoulders. Victoria's biography must rest with the chapters, and that we hope there will be the pleasure of writing the philosophic—rests with time.

George Hewitt Opens Auto Store In Luzerne

George "Barlow" Hewitt has opened a fine new Western Auto Associate Store at 175 Main Street, Luzerne, in his recently completed store building. The announcement will be of interest to all automobile owners and householders of this region for the stock carried in the store is most complete including radios, autoaccessories, fishing tackle, bicycles, tools, electrical supplies, hardware, toys, batteries and everything the car owner, mechanic, or householder might require.

Although locally owned and operated the store is affiliated with Western Auto Supply Company, largest wholesaling organization of its kind in the world handling widely accepted and nationally advertised merchandise. Many persons are already familiar with the Western Auto Supply store in Scranton. Now a similar store is establishing in Luzerne.

Mr. Hewitt was born and reared in Luzerne and is the son of George Hewitt, Sr., of Bennett Street. He is a brother of Harold Hewitt and John Hewitt, Executive of Wyoming Valley Council, Boy Scouts. After graduating from Luzerne High School, Mr. Hewitt attended Wyoming Seminary. Later he was the first transport pilot graduated at Wyoming Valley Airport. He established and operated for four years the airport at Blakeslee and was for five years manager of Easton Airport. During 1932 and 1933 he spent five months in Germany at Munich and Tempelhof air fields learning German aviation. For the past two and one-half years he has been employed in Easton, where in June he married Miss Dorothy Burbur.

On another page of this newspaper Mr. Hewitt is advertising a number of popular items at special prices for opening sale. Catalogs are also being distributed to shoppers of the vicinity. "Barlow" cordially invites all to visit the store this week-end during the opening and inspect the line of merchandise he is offering for sale. No other similar store in the Valley sells for less.

Meeker Grange Leader Dies At Age Of 79

Alonzo Wolfe, 79, a prominent leader in local Grange activities, died last Saturday morning at his home in Meeker following two weeks' illness of pneumonia. Mr. Wolfe was a lifelong resident of Lehman Township. He was a member of the Meeker Methodist Church and served as a trustee of the Meeker Grange for many years.
