lucant to have the incident end. Later that evening we were in the city and we saw a newspaper bulletin board upon which were scribbled late flashes from London and Berlin and Rome. People passed by, back and forth, but no one stopped to read. In a topsy turvy world such as this, it is peculiarly appropriate that death, conquest, a bloody election, a torpedoed ship and the flight of homeless refugees should be taken for granted and that men and women should consider precious the simple things which once were the commonplace elements of monotony. To hike along a country road, oblivious to the hum from the silvery speck in the sky; to breathe deeply of air untainted by the smell of rotting flesh; to speak and write as you please; to go to sleep knowing there can be no siren signalling death's presence; to cling tenaciously to the conviction that nations are agencies for collective progress, not engines for conquest; to live—just simply to live—these are the things of value in this changed world.

NOW THERE IS unaccountable pleasure in the comradeship of friends who drop in for a soda and conversation with you after the movies. You notice, as if you had been blind until now, the velvety-green lawns and the sun-dappled gardens you pass every day on your way to work. It is an exciting privilege to be able to argue about the Dodgers or Joe Louis along the lunch counter at noon. In this strange, new kind of day there is scarcely a moment which passes which does not provide material for an hour's reflection. We cannot remember when the flowers were so lovely as they are today. We wonder sometimes if it is like this in England and Germany and Italy and if the Mediterranean is bluer this summer, and if the Black Forest is more magnificent, and if the English countryside is unusually verdant. We wonder, too, if there is some cosmic balance, some infinite law of compensation which functions in times such as these, conceding a double portion of beauty to compensate the unhappy and matter-of-fact destruction of so much life. The days are richer, and slip past more swiftly when they are numbered, it appears.

'Dinner At Eight' At Grove Theatre Next Week When Edna Ferber and George Kaufman collaborate on a play, it's a guarantee of enjoyment. And when "Dinner at Eight" by these authors is presented by the cast of Grove Theatre during the week of July 15th you may prepare yourself for a tingling view of life behind the society page's glamorous headlines. Deftly, with irony and wit, the lives of a fashionable dinner party are outlined. There is the worried host, secretly faced with financial ruin and certain death from heart trouble; the coarse, scheming financier from the West, secretly responsible for his host's disasters; his common wife with the mind of an ill-tempered child; late hat-check girl at the Hottentot Club, who has snared another of the guests, a fashionable physician risen from Tenth Avenue; his long-suffering wife; and Larry Renault, movie idol past his prime, arrogant, foolhardy, dissipated. There is some minor blackmail, adultery, suicide, a duel in the butcher's pantry. There is a host of other activities, exciting situations, plot and counter-plot, as the lives of the characters go under a microscope—there to be displayed in amused, entertaining and merciless fashion. The dialogue is racy, especially in the raucous bedroom brawl between the Westerner and his wife.

Artillery's Roar Brings War Home

an air raid or if an incendiary bomb hits our house. It is a jolly life, but curiously enough there is less sign of worry to be found among the people.

They are cultivating their gardens and playing their cricket and tennis and shopping just as if it were a normal summer. I have found among those I have spoken to two determinations, both equally grim. One is to get this war won and the other is to bring about a lot of badly needed changes afterwards. People who used to do little serious thinking about the future of the world are now thinking very deeply indeed and have come to some strange conclusions.

That is one of the things that makes me feel that this war is not by any means the last of the mighty forces we shall see in action.
