and we liked them. We noted that she didn't look our way as she spoke but from the side of her face we could see her smile. Aunt Franc is blind, and has been for several years since her vision gradually started to fail one day while she was feeding her chickens.

"We like visitors," she declared with emphasis on the "like," and we responded. Aunt Franc will be 81 years old in October. She was born at Kunkle during Civil War days in a low log house with a big fireplace. Her brother, Oliver Fisher was just 17 when he enlisted.

Through her mind runs vivid pictures of snow covered hillsides with laughing youngsters sliding merrily over the crust on bundles of straw or the backs of kitchen chairs—the only sleds they knew. She recalls the interminable spring days and the muddy road past the big spring near Oliver Ellsworth's farm which led to the little red school house where she got all of her formal education.

Eighty-one years is so short she sighed. "Are incidents clearer now than when you were younger," we countered. "Oh, my yes," was her quick response. "I've been too busy most of the time to think of them—but they all come back now."

Aunt Franc loves the radio. "Isn't it wonderful," her voice quivered with emotion, "I sat right here and listened to all of the President's inauguration . . . when he put his hand on the Bible," her voice broke.

"I could see him. I'm very contented and if I'm called I shall not mind." We farm, Aunt Franc referred to the war. She is very much interested in the struggle and wants to see Germany whipped. "We'll win. But if I'm called I know it will come out all right." "Oh, don't you worry about that," we said, "the soldiers won't ever disturb a nice old lady like you." Mary interrupted, "She doesn't mean war. Aunt Franc means if she should die." Then we understood. Aunt Franc with all of her zest for life and interest in foreign news commentators wants to see Germany whipped and wants to be here when its done, but if her span is cut before that day, she'll be satisfied that her life has been complete.

Then the conversation turned. "I can go all around the house by myself," she said cheerily. Make myself a cup of tea and tell who most folks are when they start up the walk. When Mary brings packages, I can tell what they are."

We had forgotten the proofs that needed correction, the unfinished editorial on our desk. Under the spell of that little old lady we had lived for an hour in a world apart, but a world that comes often to country editors—a world of courage, determination and faith—a world of common people whose confidence and love of simple pleasure makes all the hollow sounding chatter of publicity-seeking celebrities sink into oblivion—now and forever for a country editor.

British Seaman Returns To Ship

Scotia, Saturday night, with a British convoy. Not until the boats are three days out will the captain receive a secret message telling him the port to which the ship is bound. Accompanying the convoy will be cruisers and destroyers of the Royal navy. Pace of the convoy is set by the slowest vessel in the group. These vessels follow zig-zag courses to upset sound reception devices on any following submarines. Because of this the convoys are necessarily much slower in reaching their destinations than would be the case in peace time.

The men of the merchant marine are nervous and work under tension, especially when they are approaching the British Isles. "But," he smiled and brushed back a mop of red hair, "we're prepared to take it. We're not afraid. Being a stoker isn't the easiest job on the ship. It's one of the most dangerous if you are hit, but somebody has got to do it for England."
