

Poultry Industry Stages Exhibit At Harrisburg

Thirteen States Will Have Part In Program At Farm Show Building

The humble hen will take over the State Farm Show Building at Harrisburg next week for the Sixth Annual Poultry Industries Exposition.

Scheduled for Oct. 7 to 10, inclusive, and staged by the Northeastern Poultry Products Council, the Exposition will dramatize the significance and importance of the poultry industry of Pennsylvania and 12 other northeastern states from Maine to West Virginia.

"It is fitting," State Secretary of Agriculture John H. Light said, "that this all-industry Exposition should be held this year in Pennsylvania, the Nation's leading poultry state."

"To all who keep poultry, this Exposition offers practical information on efficient production and marketing, interesting industry exhibits and displays of purebred poultry."

"To the general public, the Exposition presents the colorful story of the poultry industry of Pennsylvania and the Northeast—an industry that creates $250,000,000 in new wealth every year. It is truly the 'Poultry Industry on Parade.'"

The four-day program will highlight methods the farm flock owner and the commercial poultryman can apply to achieve more profitable production.

New problems arising from the Nation's defense effort will also be discussed. These include reports of state poultry defense committees from all sections of the country, late information on poultry feed supplies in the Northeast, and an outline of the Government's plan for increasing egg and poultry production under the food for defense program.

A number of the nation's foremost poultry breeders will display some of their best birds. One class will be restricted to pedigreed chickens that have laid 300 or more eggs as pullets and have been judged as outstanding representatives of their breed. Best bird in this competition will be named "Her of the Year."

The "Parade of the Champions" will bring together, for the first time, top northeastern entries of major breeds from major eastern egg laying contests.

From Pillar To Post

Books, though on a strictly bootleg basis, until I had finished the series. I had not been forbidden to bring them from the Sunday School Library, but some inner instinct warned me that it would not be healthy to be caught in the act. The rest of the thirty-nine books, or maybe it was fifty-three, were smuggled in under my winter coat. Long before the last book was finished, I was sated with Little Elsie and her emotional instability, but by that time it was a matter of principle. I was ready and willing to switch to something else.

The something else was "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and "Sara Crewe", followed in quick succession by a whole series of Palmer Cox Brownie Books and all of the "Five Little Peppers". For two or three years, each birthday and Christmas brought a new Pepper Book. The "Bird's Christmas Carol" figured in here somewhere, also "Emmy Lou" and "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch".

"Emmy Lou" came out in the Century Magazine at just about the turn of the century. It was published as a series of little sketches with the most delightful illustrations, and then brought out as a book. It remains one of the most poignant and touching of children's books, written clearly with a view to grown-up consumption. My mother used to read us one chapter at bedtime, but it was very difficult to get beyond the first four or five chapters. We clamored for the first and second chapters again and again. I think because we liked to picture Emmy Lou as a child our own age instead of the grown-up Emmy Lou that she became toward the end of the book.

The original edition is of course out of print, and the edition which is now on the market seems to lack something of the original atmosphere. I have never felt that Emmy Lou could actually live and breathe except between the pale blue covers of her first edition, with the darling picture of herself day-dreaming on the cover. I still have that first volume, but it shows signs of having been through the mill. We were never allowed to even handle it as small children. It lived in that holy-of-holies, Mamma's top bureau drawer. Even so, the book has been literally read to death, and has to be treated very tenderly to keep the pale-blue covers from coming off entirely, and the illustrations from showering out.

"Understood Betsy", another hardy perennial, came out in "St. Nicholas". Dorothy Canfield wrote it ostensibly for children, but she had the parents in mind, and she did not pull her punches. A librarian in a school in Oregon told me that the book was recommended on the school list for children in the fifth grade, but that the children in the eighth grade and the first year of high school monopolized it to such an extent that it had been necessary to buy two more copies for the lower grades.

The Lady-Behind-the-Counter came back from selling a book to another customer, and broke in on my reverie. "Did you want an Elsie Book?" said she.

"Perish the thought", said I. "I want a book for a little girl, but it won't be an Elsie Book. There are two books that I always give little girls. These two volumes are dotted all the way from Seattle to Nebraska to Virginia, back to Texas, and finally to Wilkes-Barre. They are "Emmy Lou", by George Madden Martin, and "Understood Betsy" by Dorothy Canfield.

MAYBE THIS LITTLE BOY WILL SOME DAY READ THIS TO ANOTHER LITTLE BOY

There ain't no justice in this world. When a young fellow is unwilling to go to school he "gets licked" and when he shows a willingness for "education" he receives the same medicine—or so it seemed to young Jackie Yapple, aged 4, on Tuesday morning. For two hours Jackie was A. W. O. L. while his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Yapple, and neighbors searched frantically all over Goss Manor, the WPA project, and down by the creek where Jackie was fishing with his dad a few days ago. But Jackie could be found nowhere. Then somebody thought of the Township school. There was Jackie forlornly waiting under a sheltering tree until recess when he could slip into the building with his young friends—all of whom are in school this year. The idea was good—the location bad. A young branch from the tree provided the instrument as Jackie was punished on spot—he had crossed two heavily traveled highways on his first day of attempted schooling. A sad day for Jackie? Well, what about, pop, who applied the rod.

"Pug" Peterson Killed

"Pug," a lively little Welsh terrier owned by Ann Peterson was killed in front of her home on Lake street, by an automobile one day last week. With her sparkling eyes and cheerful disposition, "Pug" was a favorite with all the neighbors who saved their table scraps for her daily visits. No one ever suggested that "Pug" wasn't very pretty—least of all the neighbors and Ann. Last summer "Pug" was Ann's companion when she flew to Canada with her mother to visit her granddaddy. We know how you feel, Ann, about "Pug."
