Holly Is Native Of Pennsylvania

During the Yuletide season when wreaths and sprigs of holiday holly bring the spirit of the forest close to the fireside, more than ordinary interest is manifested in this unique American evergreen.

Although most of the holly found in our Christmas markets comes from the woodlands of the South, the most northern and inland outposts of this tree are found growing naturally in Pennsylvania. Along the Atlantic seaboard holly is native, though an infrequent member of the forests, as far north as the Massachusetts coast. Until recently the natural range of holly in Pennsylvania was believed to be limited to the southeastern border counties from Philadelphia to Fulton County and the three additional counties of Dauphin, Berks and Montgomery. Specimens have been found growing as far north as Clinton County and it has also been reported from Perry, Fayette, Somerset, and Lackawanna Counties. In Lancaster County it can be found along the river from Holtwood to Maryland.
