with the canner had been highly successful and profitable and he urged local farmers to enter into the plan enthusiastically.

In order to give the growers more time to reconsider the plan and the opportunity to interest other farmers in its development, it was decided to hold another meeting in the high school auditorium next Wednesday night, February 25.

Both Boyardee Brothers, owners of the firm, were present at Wednesday night's meeting to observe the reaction of local growers to their first opportunity to interest a nationally known canner in their own local area.

caused by communication difficulties letter follows.

Signed, Adams, Adjutant General. Only recently Dick had written to D. L. Edwards, a tennis companion of many hot summer contests, that one of his friends had been machine gunned by a Japanese pilot as he bailed out of his plane over Hawaii.

Asked if he knew the boy, Dr. G. L. Howell expressed the sentiment of all Kingston Township citizens. "Did, I know, Dick, I brought him into the world. He played with my boy and peddled the Record all around these hills. When he was about fourteen he used to milk Josephine Hazeltine's cows and help her with her chores every day. He was one of the best boys in this town."

Down at the Bank Fred Eck said, "I like what an old friend said of Dick this morning. 'Something like this is the only way Dick would ever get his name in the papers,' he was that kind of boy."

He was a member of Truckville Methodist Church where he sang in the choir and was active in young people's work. He was also a member of Pi Delta Epsilon Fraternity.

Beside his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Cease, he leaves a sister, Mrs. Hamilton Young, formerly advertising manager for P. A. Brown & Co., and the wife of Dr. Hamilton Young attached to the Army Dental Corps and three brothers; Arnold in Connecticut, and Warren and Phillip Cease at home.

is supposed to hide his glass in some spot of his own choosing so that seconds and thirds and fourths will not entail extra dishwashing.

On alternate weeks we collect the small-fry of the neighborhood and teach them the steps, training one square in the dining room, then promoting them to the living-room to go through the same steps while another square learns the intricacies of the dance.

There is something very wholesome about the current revival of square-dancing. It allows a combination of all age-groups, which in itself is highly desirable. As square-dancing requires a definite number of people, eight to a square, no one has a chance to sit on the sidelines and become bored with life. There is something doing every minute. No leaving the living-room to little Johnnie and Little Susie while mother and father retire upstairs. Little Johnnie and Little Susie may be in the living-room, but they are cavorting around with all the neighborhood Johnnies and Susies while Mom and Pop are going through the same evolutions in the dining-room.

The caller stands between the two rooms and superintends both groups. When he is feeling particularly peppy he dances and calls simultaneously, but this procedure takes a great deal of wind. Sometimes he loses as much as five pounds in weight during an evening's session.

There are an astonishing number of square-dances, some of them boisterous, some of them graceful, but all of them done rapidly and with strongly accented rhythm. Each community has slight variations of the same dance, a sort of a dance-dialect which must be mastered if you wish to become letter-perfect in the art.

One group of dancers will do the figure involving a double swinging of two couples with great dignity, another group will really go to town, with the ladies' feet leaving the floor and flying straight out in the air under the influence of centrifugal motion.

Checked shirts, red flannel shirts, and even galluses are perfectly au fait at these square-dances. Men who start the evening arrayed conventionally in dark business suits, peel off coat and vest after the first dance, working down toward rock bottom as things steam up. Down to bedrock, and puffing like porpoises (or is it porpi?) the men become more and more agile as the evening progresses.

The ladies, if they are smart, will wear something severely tailored, cool and airy. They will avoid anything that is likely to part company in the middle, as some of the figures in the dance are designed to put a terrible strain upon the midriff.

They will fall into bed and sleep like logs after four hours of steady galloping, and the next morning they will be aware of a number of muscles which they did not know they possessed. They will be particularly impressed by hitherto unsuspected muscles if they have done the figure, "Ladies' hands up and gents' hands down, give'er a whirl, and around and around." The subsequent stiffness starts out mildly enough in the shoulder-blades, but progresses downwards until it takes in the pectoral muscles and the diaphragm.

The striped cats have run desperately to cover every Saturday night for about a month. They view the caller with suspicion bordering on frenzy ever since the night when he picked up one of them, cradled it in his arms, and started to twirl. Faster and faster he went, spinning on his heels until he resembled a midwest cyclone. Then he made a sudden swoop, and set the cat on its feet. Poor Willie. She started to go away from there, but the spin had befuddled her and her balance-mechanism went completely haywire. She started for the door in a series of scallops, describing arc after arc until she finally fell down the cellar stairs.

Since that time, at the first strains of the "Arkansas Traveller", both cats make a concerted dive for the great outdoors and disappear into the night.

Perhaps the neighbors feel the same way.
