Certain other vegetables, including squashes, pumpkins, melons, cucumbers, radishes, and turnips, are cross-pollinated by insects or other agencies. Their seeds, therefore, convey the characteristics we see in the plants on which they are borne, as well as those of the plants which produced the pollen, and nobody knows what combinations of the characteristics of both parents will appear in the prog-

Tomatoes, on the other hand, and certain annual flowers of the composite or daisy family, are selfpollinated to a great extent; fruits or flowers from plants which are producing a uniformly good crop may be saved for seed with some assurance that the resulting crop will be very similar to the plants selected. The fruits should be ripe when picked, and seeds may be scraped out with the surrounding pulp into a suitable container, and left to ferment for two or three days in the pulp, to free them from a mucilaginous coating which, if left on them, would cause them to stick together when dried.

After fermentation, which when complete results in the settling of the seeds to the bottom of the container, the seeds are washed on a screen, dried in a short time in the sun or in a well-ventilated room, and stored in a dry, cool place.

Peppers, which are self-pollinated to the extent of about 85 percent., also may be saved in the same manner. Seed of self-pollinated flowers, as well as other plants such as peans and peas which are dry when mature, are easily saved. One should be sure, however, that they are free from insects and diseases.

Food for Freedom

Have you considered this business of raising broilers? We've talked a lot about it lately. You know, of course, that meat is going to be rationed . . . that there are shortages of beef, pork and lamb . . . that egg prices are higher this summer than in years . . . that submarine warfare off our coasts has reduced the available supply

All this has a lot to do with the broiler business. You can raise food for freedom in twelve weeks. That is the time required to bring a chicken to 31/4 pounds.

For years chicken has been considered a food for Sunday family dinners or for something a little special. Do you know any reason why it shouldn't be considered in the same category with beef, pork and lamb, to be served as an every day food? That is just what is happening. There aren't enough broilers being grown to meet the increasing demand.

If you have the buildings . . . if you are willing to give the time . . . if you want to make some extra money, come in and let us explain this broiler business to you. Not a man this mill serves has lost a cent in the broiler business. All have made nice profits and all are increasing their flocks. That's why you can-
