New War Plant For Scranton

In cooperation with the U. S. Army Air Corps, the Wilkening Manufacturing Co., of Philadelphia, maker of Pedrick piston rings, is constructing in Scranton, Pa., a new war plant for the production of piston rings for Army aircraft.

The Scranton location has the advantage of being located in the mountains away from the exposed Eastern Coast. Also, the available supply of workers is considered more favorable than in many other production centers.

In its operation of the new plant, the Wilkening Manufacturing Co. will employ upwards of 1200 workers. The Company already is heavily engaged in the production of aircraft piston rings at its main plant in Philadelphia where key people are being trained for the operation of the new plant as soon as it is completed.

Raid Warning System Faulty

Few People Heed Daylight Alert

With a regularity that has become commonplace, the surprise air raid alert on Monday morning caught the Back Mountain Region unprepared. Once again air raid wardens were out-of-town or away from their stations and there was no secondary system to take care of such emergencies.

Long blasts from fire sirens gave the warning, but most people didn't know whether they heralded a conflagration, an air raid or the second coming. Most people went about their business as usual except along the main streets or on State highways where all traffic was stopped.

In Dallas it was not until Mrs. Paul Shaver sent word to the schools—long after the sirens had been going—that pupils were herded in from recess play to take part in an air raid drill. Students playing football on Pinecrest avenue were unaware of the alarm.

Other schools received the warning earlier and there was little delay in putting drills into effect. In the rural sections and at Idetown citizens were oblivious to the alert.
