TRAPPERS SUPPLYING 'NEW, VITAL NEED

Illustration reproduced by permission of Photo Section, Philadelphia Q. M. Depot

America's trappers—including the youngsters and the women who are carrying on for absent sons, brothers and husbands—may rightfully smile with pride as they keep the nation's trappings going. For the product of their endeavor, fur, is playing a new role today.

Always valued as a source of income and as an article of high fashion and warmth, fur is now doing its part in outfitting Uncle Sam's Arctic fighters—so that they may better withstand the rigors of cold. As an example, parka hoods for the uniforms of our ski troops (see illustration) are among the items whose production depends upon the output of the country's trappers. Also the fur vests worn by the men who sail our ships through Northern waters. With increased attention being paid to materials for warm clothing, furs are becoming more and more important to a fighting victory-bound America.

The raw fur crop is here—along the streams, in the woods and fields—literally waiting to be taken. Practically no investment is required—only some traps and the effort needed to run the trapline. And as for the effort, if desired it can be limited to spare time—a feature which fits in beautifully with either schoolboy's or housewife's daily routine.

Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hobbs.
