FROM FIELDS AFAR

they are taking over Nagasaki, one of the Jap cities hit by the Atomic Bomb.

Nagasaki is on the western side of Kyashu, the southernmost of the large Jap home islands. To get here we had to go into the East China Sea. So far I haven't seen very much of Nagasaki, but I didn't have to have much time to learn that there were large shipyards here at one time. Naturally that was before the B-29's came over. Those "air horn battleships" really did a good job around here. All that is left is a concrete skeleton of what used to be a part of a shipyard. There are a lot of Jap ships here in the harbor, ships that were not even completed before they were either sunk or damaged beyond repairs. This part of the city is about ten miles away from the main drag, where the Atomic Bomb did its work, so there are still quite a few houses left standing. Someday I hope to go down the Main Street of Nagasaki, if there are any streets in Nagasaki.

All the Japs I have seen so far live in wooden houses that look like they were made of drift wood, and stuck together with chewing gum. Even the paint which they never got wouldn't help them any. I was quite surprised to see that most of the houses have electricity, but then I have seen a lot of things that have surprised me more.

There are a lot, and I mean a lot, of small islands that make up this city, and to get from one island to another they have small boats, propelled in a most unusual manner, across perhaps a mile, or a mile and a half of water. These small islands are what make Nagasaki such a good natural harbor, and an ideal place for a shipyard.

Mountains seem to come up right out of the sea and rise hundreds of feet. These are all green now, and they could almost be called beautiful. I like the weather too. This is the first time in over seven months that I have had to put covers over me at night. Sometimes the temperature gets as low as seventy, and even sixty-nine on cold days. After having been on Saipan and Guam for a while, that is really cold.

We are all unloaded now, but someone said we were going to unload A.P.A.s and A.K.A.s, and would be here for perhaps three weeks, and then—well rumor has it, we are going to China. You know . . . I have never been to China . . .

Be seeing you one of these days, Dick

P. S. I thought typing would be easier to read, but I discovered I can't type either. Gosh!

• We've been thinking of you often, Dick. Your mother tells me you and George and your cousin Fred were together for several days and that you entertained them aboard ship. Hope to see you soon. —Your Neighbor.
