Those Beloved Colored Lithographs

AMERICAN PRINTS are deservedly popular. They are a dramatic pictorial record of events, places, persons, manner and dress, as well as sports and occupations during the first century of life in these United States. For example, prints of the early American railroads tell the story of the winning of the West. They show a wealth of interesting details, such as wood-burning locomotives, ornate but diminutive passenger coaches, depot restaurants where through trains stopped "twenty minutes for lunch," thus giving basis for the complaint of Rudyard Kipling that "the American never dines, but stuffs for ten minutes thrice daily."

Of course a tear is where the paper has been torn in handling.

AMERICAN HOME, WINTER
This is one of the best of the Carrier & Ives small folio Winter Scenes. It is much less expensive than their large size winter scenes, practically all of which were done from paintings by Durrie, the New Haven, Connecticut artist (1820-1883). His most famous large folio "Home for Thanksgiving" is now one of the expensive American lithographs and is cheap at $500 if you can find a copy in good condition.

These prints are of various kinds and sorts. There are copper plate engravings, wood cuts, and lithographs. The latter were usually colored by hand, many of them by young women who worked from a master copy. There were also steel engravings where, as the name indicates, a plate of steel was the material on which the picture was delineated.

Some bring a high price today because of their rarity; others, often older and just as interesting and significant, are quite inexpensive because they are easy to find. At a farmhouse I once bought a print of an American clipper ship under full sail for two dollars and the owner felt so much over-paid that he insisted on giving me a plump roasting chicken as well. I might add that this transaction took place quite a long time ago. Today such a print is worth $35 and up.

Although a 19th Century product, American prints rank as antiques. This despite the fact that many of

Sometimes the damage is repaired so skillfully that it is hard to detect it, but a print in this condition should not be priced as high as the same one with the paper untern. Trimming refers to where the margins have been cut for framing or other reasons, thus making the margin of white paper smaller than it was originally. There are many ways in which a print may have been stained. Often it was the result of framing without adequate backing so that here and there the print became streaked from the cracks of the wood that held it in place or from a crack in the glass protecting it. Foxing is a technical term referring to the brownish blotches that develop in paper because of dampness or air conditions. Cleanliness and brilliance being positive virtues, are readily recognized.

Finally, references to folios, small, large and elephant, are just another way of stating that these lithographs came in three sizes, determined by that of the paper or folio used for printing them.
