

"The Totem Pole"

By M. William Denison
CAPITOL NEWS SERVICE

Both Republicans and Democrats are busy oiling their political machines these days and when the great race comes off in November, there will be a rather decent sized crowd in the bleachers, if present activity could be taken as any indication.

The Democrats are as busy as beavers fussing around in the counties drumming up interest in registration—and are meeting with success. Then too they have started their campaign (although as yet without the speeches) in that they are consistently attacking the Republican administration of Governor Martin.

As noted before in these columns, the Republican strategy has been so far, to ignore the written blasts of their opponents. But lately, both the printed denunciations and the zealous registration drive of the Democrats have the Republican hierarchy a bit on the perturbed side.

For example, the other day an informal meeting was held in the Governor's Office with those in attendance including all the slated State-wide candidates and the name-people of the Republican Party in Pennsylvania. The usual public announcement and fanfare proclaiming the meeting was missing.

Reporters learned of the meeting however and waited in the reception room of the Governor's Office until it was all over. But through the ancient, stained, solid oak doors of the Governor's Office could be heard voices—and the voices were raised in anything but a whisper. The leaders were battling it out, and battle they did. When it was over, Republican State Chairman M. Harvey Taylor appeared surrounded by fellow-conferees and after recovering from the unexpected sight of members of the press, smiled and said that campaign issues and strategy had been discussed.

The usually good-natured State Chairman said that the Republican Party will make an aggressive campaign to meet the registration campaign already being conducted by the Democrats and the CIO Political Action Committee.

That in itself was a good indication, when the background is known, that the Republicans are in for a stiffer fight than originally expected. Speaking campaigns of the Republicans, on a concentrated basis are expected to get under way in mid-September, while the Democrats have already started theirs.

Uncle Remus, picking himself up and brushing off his coat after stumbling over a shiny brass cuspidor, remarked that he thought it was about time both party candidates "hit the trail" instead of waiting until the last minute. He recalled an incident of his earlier years when he was running for burgess, and had waited too long to get started.

"Why before I knew it," he chortled, "the election was over and I hadn't even had a chance to vote, let alone do any campaigning."

"And of course you lost," we added as an afterthought.

"Nope—I won," was the startled rejoinder from Uncle Remus, who added slyly, "I was the only candidate."

He sat down, and rubbing his sunburned varicose veins, remarked that such things don't happen that way very often these days.

"You've got to get out there and fight like an old hound-dog," he said. "I'm sure glad to see both the Republicans and Democrats getting ready to do that very thing. I'll give us boys something to mull over down at the old village pump."
