Old Sheffield Plate
BEFORE THE DAYS of savings banks and safety deposit vaults, silver platters, trays, teapots and the like served both as household dishes and gilt edged securities. A rich man had a quantity of such pieces; the man of moderate means a few silver spoons of varying sizes and though his appreciation of the larger pieces might be as keen as that of his wealthier neighbor, he had to be content with items formed of less costly material and which, until the middle of the 18th Century, in no way resembled silver.

of the 18th Century resulted in silver coating on both sides, thus forming a metal sandwich with copper for the filling. Sheffield plate pieces in style and workmanship closely following that of silver were made from 1750 to 1840 when the still cheaper process of electroplating succeeded it. Old Sheffield plate can be distinguished from solid silver by the undersides of its edges. To hide the reddish copper line between the two silver layers, the upper layer was either drawn over the copper and turned over the

A GEORGE III TRAY OF SHEFFIELD PLATE
The simplicity of its design reflects the Adam period, although it was made about 1810 when the Regency style was fashionable. The gadrooned or fluted edge and handles provide the decoration. The central coat of arms was engraved on a plaque of coin silver, inlaid for this purpose so no trace of copper would show.

The first satisfactory substitute for this precious metal was discovered in 1742 by Thomas Boulsover of Sheffield, England. In mending a broken knife he accidentally fused silver and copper. He found the two metals were inseparable when heated to a proper degree, experimented further and made a few small pieces in this new material. One of his apprentices, Josiah Hancock, carried on where he left off and in a few years had an important industry. Called Sheffield plate after the town where it originated, factories for its making were soon established in Birmingham, London and on the continent.

In preparing Sheffield plate an ingot of copper was cleaned and smoothed. Then a thin plate of silver was laid over it, the two wired together and put into a charcoal furnace to stay until the silver began to melt. Then the ingot was taken out, cooled and treated like silver, that is, rolled out into sheets of whatever thickness was desired and made into household items by regular silver-smithing methods. The earliest Sheffield plate had silver on only one side with the reverse tinned. Further experiments during the second half raw edge or a covering border of silver was applied. As a result a fine line is apparent either to the eye or the touch. In the same way one can tell whether a piece is real old Sheffield or modern electroplate. The labor involved in preparing Sheffield plate and making it into various pieces was undoubtedly greater than in regular silver-smithing, but the cost of the material was so much less that the purchaser of average means could have a fine tray, like the one shown here, for half the amount a silver one of the same design and size would cost. Since there was a government tax on silver pieces, Sheffield plate found favor even with those who could well afford the more expensive ware. Probably the finest pieces were made in the last quarter of the 18th Century when the Adam influence was strong and resulted in classic, graceful tea and coffee pots, urns, platters and other table pieces. However, the ornate but handsome pieces made in the early years of the 19th Century during the Sheraton and Regency periods are not to be passed over. They are both desirable and worth owning.
