The Staying Power of Windsors

THERE ARE FEW long established households without one or more Windsor chairs. This bears witness to their popularity when they were new furniture, bought not for beauty of line and proportion so much as because they were the latest fashion. Being good comfortable chairs that could be sat in by heavy men without fear of damage if tilted backward, they were much appreciated and widely used. Yet they were late arrivals in America.

Although they have an ancestry that traces descent from an English chair of the 13th Century, the first of the American colonies was over a hundred years old before Windsors appeared here.

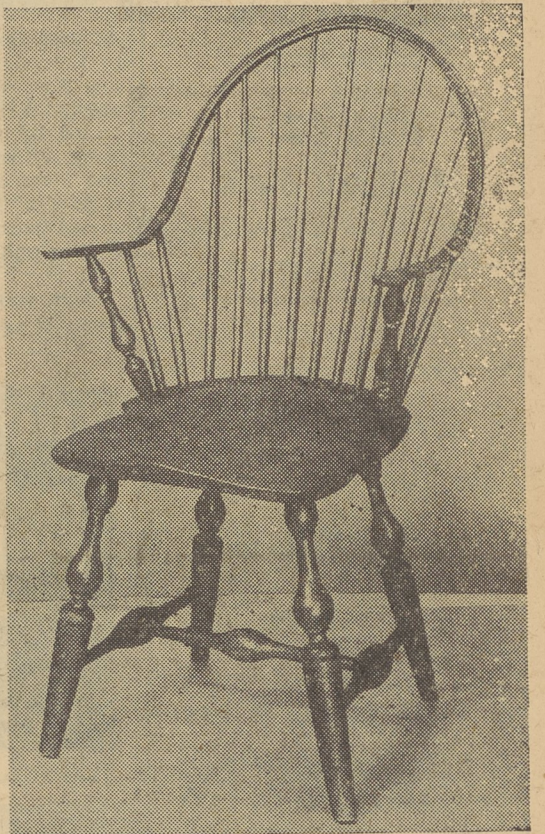

In England they were simple pieces of cottage furniture, the product of country workshops, notably those in and around the town of Windsor, and fashioned from yew and elm cut in the forests of Buckinghamshire. About 1725 a few of them arrived in America and made their appearance in the chief city of William Penn's colony for members of the Society of Friends. There native craftsmen quickly went to work adapting the Windsor idea to American tastes.

They made chairs with more splay to the legs than the English importations and into the U-shaped top rail of the low back, they fitted ten to twelve tapering spindles instead of the usual ornamental back splat and spindles. The results were Windsor chairs with an American accent. As such they rapidly migrated to other sections, working northward through New Jersey, New York and into New England. Soon there were craftsmen whose trade designation, Windsor Chairmaker, made it clear that they were specialists.

Under their hands the chair of the English cottager developed into a piece suited to the residence of a country squire or similar worthy. Even handsome town houses were not entirely without one or more of them. But where some pieces, like the high-boy, came into favor, were made for a time and then ceased to be made at all, the Windsor chair held its public far beyond the period when furniture was a craftsman product.

Windsor chairs were made for homes and for public buildings and by both city and country chairmakers. It is safe to say that between 1740 and 1840 there was hardly a town from Maine to the Carolinas that did not have its Windsor chairmaker. Nor were all of these chairs made by specialists or even general practitioners in cabinetry. Many of them came into being because some farmer needed chairs and was skilled in the use of the simpler tools. He bought the turned parts at the country store; the wood for the saddle-shaped seats, the spindles and arched hoop for the back came from his own woodlot. These home-made chairs were simple, strong and comfortable. They are appreciated today for the same reasons. Also, the fact that they have survived a century and more of hard usage and are still sturdy, proves that these untutored makers did their work well.
