The Popular Sideboard

IN AN ERA when course dinners were unheard of, the term sideboard was a literal one. Functionally this piece was the 18th Century version of today's serving pantry. On its broad top the various fish dishes, roasts of beef, veal, mutton, pork, and poultry, which it was the custom to serve all at once, were carved and kept hot during the meal. It was a piece of furniture that appeared in its most elaborate form in the homes of the wealthy where it was the post of the butler during dinner. Here he presided, doing some of the carving, supervising the footmen who did the actual serving.

After the meal was over, the sideboard became a butler's pantry. With the last of the diners gone, deep, lead-lined drawers were filled with first in Hepplewhite's book of designs, credit for its origin has been given him quite erroneously. For the man who took the elements of the sideboard's predecessors and evolved them into a handsome and useful piece of diningroom furniture, was Thomas Shearer, a prominent cabinetmaker of London and a contemporary of both Hepplewhite and Sheraton. He also published a book related to furniture.

It was The Cabinet-Maker's London Book of Prices and contained a number of plates of design, including five signed by Shearer showing the new sideboard which he had originated. Craftsmen both sides of the Atlantic were soon making pieces in this manner. Those in America began filling orders from their clients about hot water for washing fine glass and silver. Other drawers stored the partly empty bottles of wines and stronger vintages. Into knife boxes the silver that never left the diningroom and with a few choice pieces of silver, china, and glass set on its top, the sideboard became between meals a display piece.

Changing ways of life eventually removed dishwashing to the kitchen along with the charcoal brazier for keeping food hot, and the sideboard changed accordingly. Early pieces were brought up to date by the removal of the lead lining of sink drawers. Occasionally a sideboard of this type will be found in original condition and thus testify to an earlier mode of life.

This versatile piece which was the immediate descendant of the earlier side table, first made its appearance about 1788 and was made in the styles of Hepplewhite, Sheraton and the Regency, both in England and America. Because it came to notice
