the poor man of the early 19th Century, was the first step toward clocks for the common people. Inventing and patenting what is now referred to as a banjo clock was just an accident in a clockmaking career of seventy-seven years. For Simon Willard began making clocks when he was only thirteen years old and reluctantly laid down his tools at the age of ninety. His capacity for work was amazing and his hand was as skillful in business for himself. In fact, having every intention of living to be a hundred Willard contracted with his friend, Josiah Quincy, Mayor of Boston, to make a clock during that hundredth year. For it Quincy agreed to pay whatever Willard should ask. Willard died August 30, 1848, in his ninety-sixth year, so both men lost.

Simon Willard was born in Grafton, Massachusetts, in 1753, the sixth son of a large family. He was apprenticed to a roving clock tinker at the age of twelve. Just a year later he made an eight-day, brass movement grandfather clock which was equal to any made by the best was eighteen, he had his own shop in his native village.
