Footnotes

By Emmons Blake

My brother, David, who just returned from Guam and saw his nine-month-old son, Peter, for the first time, seemed to get a large charge out of giving the boy his bath. While I had mastered all of the other professional tricks of parenthood, I had managed to steer clear of giving Diana her bath for her full eleven months. But tonight I changed all that. I took over the small task just to see if I would be like my brother. I found it fun to wash off the dust of the day from the little girl.

When she was tiny, I had balked because she looked so helpless in water and I didn't like the thought of handling her while she was slipping with soap. But now that she is almost a year old, I feel much safer around her.

She sits in the tub and grabs immediately for a spare wash cloth. This is her favorite toy in the tub. She has celluloid ducks, plastic balls with fish inside, a small battleship and other floating toys, but alongside a wet wash cloth they leave her cold. She is content as long as she can chew the soggy cloth and slap the water with it.

Her knees are soiled from scooting around on them all day and they really get a buffing, but the rest of her is just soaped lightly and rinsed off. She stands up in the tub to be rinsed and holds onto the faucets while I pour water over her. Drying is great sport. She tries to roll up in the big towel and when I dry her face she bites down on the towel and holds on tight until her laughing makes her let go.

Bathing Diana is, if her mother will allow the comparison, vastly different from the way I used to bathe my dog. Pepper was not interested in chewing a wash cloth. In fact, I can't recall using one on her. Nor did she have a bath tub full of floating toys. But then, Diana does not shake herself dry and me wet, nor roll on the floor to show her joy in a bath completed.

Executive Board

Mrs. Louise Colwell of Ridge street will be hostess to the Executive Board of Jessie Austin Brickel Memorial Class at her home Monday evening, May 12, at 8 o'clock.
