out the country. We were blissfully unaware of the fact until we returned to Port Deposit that evening. We found the Captain with his car glued to the radio looking like a stricken man. He kept mumbling "Pearl Harbor" damn Japs" and we thought he had taken leave of his senses. The frightened one was the one to break the news gently to us and for once she outshone her husband. He couldn't believe that we had been knocking around Washington all day long and hadn't heard the news. He kept saying, "just think you were in Washington at the time." Two hours later when Norm and I retired I said from force of habit, "just think you were in Washington at the time" and he replied "better Washington than Pearl Harbor. Tomorrow we'll be at war."
