LABOR DAY 1949

Only in the United States is the first Monday in September officially regarded as LABOR DAY. In the year 1894 Congress passed a bill making that day a legal holiday and for the past fifty-five years Labor Day has been participated in by all the people of the nation and, except during war time, observed by the closing of factories and stores. It is in keeping with the American tradition that this should be so.

It has never been a part of the American character to glorify the idler—it is to workers that the nation's respect and honor are given. On this fifty-fifth anniversary of Labor Day, the men and women of labor can look back with rightful pride on their achievements in both war and peace. Through their skills and strengths America has been built—and in time of peril preserved. The nation joins with Labor in celebrating this day.
