Pillar To Post

what happens to an infant in its first year or even in its first week or month, is vitally important, affecting its entire after life. The foundation of all human emotion is laid while the infant is in the cradles, long before it sits up, before it erupts teeth, before it even remotely resembles anything except a very old man or something with simian ancestry.

With all this in mind, and a grandmother tongue in the cheek, I shall now predict with reasonable certainty the next step.

About year after next some forward looking pediatrician is going to cautiously suggest that Nature, a canny old bird who is very very wise in the matter of mothers and babies, never expected a baby to be relegated to a sterile basket in the nursery with the door closed against its parents during the long cold hours of the night. That pediatrician will in all seriousness write an article for the baby trade, affirming that the happiest and best adjusted baby will be the one who has spent its nights in the sheltering curve of its mother's arm, warm and protected and cherished, with nourishment on tap and within easy reach.

Already the young mother who is fortunate enough to patronize the most modern hospitals, can have her baby in the same room with her. This adds a considerable item to the bill, but it is worth it. She is allowed to pat him when he cries and even feed him when he is hungry.

Breaking in a baby is like breaking in a pair of tight new shoes. The shoes end up by breaking in the feet, and the baby ends up by breaking in the parents. Everything goes fine as soon as the baby lets you know who is boss.
