neighbor with a damning needle threaded with stout cord. Some households quartered the apples and strung them but this took longer for thorough drying than the more laborious method of peeling, coring, and slicing thin slices across the apple.

The trouble with this sort of nostalgic reminiscence is that the writer is likely to sell herself a bill of goods, occupying her evenings with the stringing of apples and the munching of popcorn. Drying slices on a screen may be O.K. for one who has no memory of the strings in the attic, but it lacks soul.
