of the window panes and the automatic furnace ran overtime to compensate. We liked it from the vantage point of a station wagon with a heater.

But we especially liked it from a distance of a couple thousand miles, say Key West, where soft breezes blew and the sun baked the burning sands.

What we need for that frozen hour in the morning before the sun has had a chance to mellow the air is an Eskimo parka and a pair of fur-lined boots.

We like winter. But we like it with a sufficient perspective to guarantee real enjoyment, or with sufficient personal upholstery to insulate us against it.

We like an old fashioned winter. From a stance behind the bird-feeder at the office window, with a recessed radiator sending up a pervasive warmth, we can appreciate the blue shadows on the snow, and the evergreens dark against the white background, and the advantages to the water table, and the heartening thought of green grass in the spring.

But given our druthers, we druther not plod up Franklin street in the teeth of the wind at eight-forty A. M.

to game officers. This may be the means of locating a new flock that might otherwise suffer loss in the critical winter season.

Inquiries have been received as to how small turkey feeders may be established. A basket-like feeder may be made of wide mesh poultry wire. Another, somewhat similar shaped corn holder may be fashioned from dead branches. When a person goes into the forest to construct the latter feeder the only tools he needs carry are a few nails and a hatchet. This feeder is nailed between trees growing close together. Both the wood and wire feeders are fastened high enough above the ground to keep deer from tearing them down, and both are covered at the top to prevent squirrels from carrying off the ears of corn. Sticks are nailed to trees supporting the feeders so that turkeys can roost as they feed. Spring runs, where these birds habitually seek winter greens and grit, provide excellent sites for such turkey cafeterias.
