Here's How

Does your family like jelly? What you buy in the store these days is pretty expensive for a shockingly small glass or jar. But you can have plenty of jelly as a sideline to making apple-sauce, and of course you make apple sauce for the children all winter. Every time you make it, you have the makings for a glass of jelly.

Do you peel your apples first and take out the cores, or do you quarter them, stew them up and then run them through the Foley Mill?

If you peel them, put the peels and the cores into a small saucepan, cover with water, and boil briskly until the peels are limp and lifeless, the cores a pulp. Pour this liquid through a strainer and measure.

Measured? Pour it back in the saucepan and boil it down to one-half. If you had a cupful of juice before boiling, measure out a cupful of sugar. When the liquid is reduced in bulk, add the sugar, taking the pan off of the fire while you stir it to make it dissolve.

Then boil it again. It will rise up in the pan, and you'll have to watch it, to keep it from running over. It will make a jelly test almost at once, especially if the apples were nice green ones.

A jelly test? It's when two thick streams run off the edge of your cooking spoon instead of one thin stream, and sometimes there's a little sheet between the streams. If the jelly isn't too solid, a bit runny, it's exactly right to put on French toast or pancakes. If it's good and solid, it's for toast. Who cares, just so it's jelly.

And it didn't cost you anything except the sugar.

Weight control is not only an approach to preservation of health—it is a measure of prevention against the major diseases of middle and later life such as heart disease, diabetes and liver diseases.
