

Those Over 65 Are Not Exempt From Reporting

S. S. Reports Must Be Made For Workers Regardless Of Age

The age of a worker or a self-employed person makes no difference so far as reporting wages or self-employment income for social security purposes is concerned. This clarification of wage and self-employment income reporting requirements was made by Christopher G. Boland, Manager of the Wilkes-Barre Social Security Office, in response to many inquiries as to whether wages paid a worker who is past age 65 must be reported.

"There seems to be an impression that persons over age 65 are exempt from social security taxes. This is not true," Mr. Boland said. "Wages paid an individual for work on a job covered by social security or self-employment income earned in a trade or business under social security must be reported irrespective of the individual's age."

"Another erroneous belief is that once a person has qualified for old age and survivors insurance payments, he is no longer required to pay the social security tax. This question is raised most frequently by workers who are over age 75 and are, therefore, entitled to collect their monthly insurance payments while continuing to earn more than $75 a month on a job under social security. Wages paid such individuals must be reported," Mr. Boland emphasized.

The same rule applies at the other end of the age scale. Wages paid a youngster at any age, if for a job under social security, should be reported, Mr. Boland explained.
