Crocuses Are In Bloom

Joe Norton, God's gift to the bird and squirrel population in the Beck Mountain Area, called Friday to say that she had orange crocuses in bloom on the sunny side of her house on Huntsville Road, Dallas, and white snow drops. Joe covers them with pine bows at night, so we know they're still there—in spite of Friday's snow!

The M.Y.F. of the Orange Church will attend the district rally to be held in the Elm Park Methodist Church in Scranton on Sunday evening. Members will assemble at the Orange Church no later than 6:15 p. m.

The W.S.C.S. will meet in the church parlors on Wednesday evening, March 13.

17-Year Locusts Due This Year

An invasion of 17-year locusts is due in varying degree in at least 18 Pennsylvania counties the latter part of next May, according to L. H. Bull, State Deputy Secretary of Agriculture.

He cautioned fruit growers to protect young trees from locust damage. The locusts are not harmful to humans but can do extensive damage to trees when they appear in large numbers, Bull explained.

Known to scientists as the "periodic cicada," there are eight different "broods" that emerge from the ground in Pennsylvania every 17 years, each in a different year.

The coming of "Brood XIV" is the first appearance of any brood in Pennsylvania since the so-called big locust year in 1953 when records show emergence in 35 counties in the eastern half of the State. The next will be in 1961.

Counties where brood XIV last appeared in 1940 and in which they may be expected the last week in May, to disappear by early July, include: Adams, Bedford, Berks, Blair, Clearfield, Clinton, Cumberland, Franklin, Lehigh, Luzerne, Montour, Northumberland, Potter, Snyder, Schuylkill, Tioga, Union and York.

Appearance of locusts may be heavy in some of the counties, very light or not at all in others. They may even crop up in new areas depending on depletion or increase of broods during the 17-year hibernation period. Bull called upon farmers and others to report appearances to the Department.

According to records maintained by Dr. Thomas L. Guyton, director, Bureau of Plant Industry, Bull said the periodical cicada due this year will appear also from Massachusetts to Illinois and south to Northern Georgia. While the pest may not be especially heavy in Pennsylvania there will be damage to small twigs of trees where female locusts slit the bark to deposit eggs, thereby weakening the twig to the breaking point. Leaves die on the broken tip and may give a "dead" appearance to many trees in a highly infested area.

When two newlyweds feather their nest, it's usually not hard to find four well plucked parents near by.
