For Stamp Collectors

By EARL P. L. APFELBAUM

Non-collectors often ask, "Who collects stamps?" Of course there is no stock pattern that fits all collectors any more than you can apply exact identifying factors to other classifications of people. However, so many adult stamp collectors have gone through particular stages of philatelic development that it is possible to state with accuracy the major milestones of many stamp collecting careers.

Our typical collector started saving stamps at the age of ten to twelve. He was introduced to the hobby by the birthday gift of a beginner's kit consisting of a small album, a package of 500 different stamps and 1000 stamp hinges. His enthusiasm was in direct proportion to his natural curiosity about the size and shape of the world and the occupants of its distant parts. With proper parental encouragement he continued with his collection, with time out for sports and other juvenile activities, until at about the age of fifteen he "discovered girls".

There usually followed a lapse of several years until college and army service had been completed. Then once again stamps were taken up with the realization that no better tonic for mental well-being exists. An interesting sidelight to this statement is the fact that cases of stamp collectors in mental institutions are unknown.

The resumption of collecting is usually a continuation of the worldwide collection started as a child. With ordinary interests and time in the course of a few years this grows to be a large many-albumed collection that perhaps takes more time than our ever busier collector can afford. He also finds that he enjoys some part of his hobby much more than other parts. As a natural consequence he devotes a continually larger share of the money he spends and time he devotes to achieving completion in the best-loved part of his philatelic holdings.

This is the beginning of the so-called "specialist" stage of philately. From here on, a lifetime may be devoted to an ever increasing study of the postal history and stamp issues of his favorite. As the background of the stamps becomes better known there is a natural connection with the history, geography, economic life and natural resources of the place concerned with his specialty. Our collector becomes the fountainhead for encyclopedic knowledge that cannot be obtained from any other single source. He may or may not write articles for public information, but authorities throughout the world will know of him and consult him on problems relative to his subject.

All the while his general collection of stamps has been continued for the pleasure and relaxation that it gives him. Whenever nervous tension has made knots in his thinking ability stamps untie them, so that he can go back to his work refreshed as from a vacation.

He recognizes the benefits that his hobby has brought him and in return, whenever possible, gives small boys and girls gifts of an album, stamps and hinges that they, too, might journey through life over a road made smoother and more beautiful by stamp collecting.
