Accident Leads To Fascinating Business

See that crutch? That crutch is responsible for Mrs. William Lamb's pursuit of a hobby that turned into a business, with quarters of its own, and a bright future. Mrs. Lamb still uses the crutch to get around, but she parks it when making or decorating a lampshade. She'll still be making lamp shades, even when she abandons the crutch. Her experience proves that a broken bone may be made to pay dividends.

Lamp-Shade Business Outgrows Home, Moves Into Studio Annex

Mrs. William Lamb's expanding business in lamp-shade making has outgrown the house in West Dallas and moved into a recently constructed addition at the rear, with its own side entrance.

Lamp-shades in all stages of construction and decoration crowd the shelves and cabinet tops, and frame parts hang behind a louvered screen on peg-boards.

Mrs. Lamb, a portrait painter who now adds a fascinating craft to her art, studies a lamp before making the shade. If a customer wants a shade for a painted china base, Mrs. Lamb copies the design and adapts it to the larger area. Sometimes, when dealing with a glass lamp for a boudoir, she drops a handful of apple blossoms into the transparent base, and paints apple blossoms on the shade.

Some lamps call for translucent shades treated with oil, and some for the more opaque type.

People bring oddities to be turned into lamps, pottery, vases, jugs, and the like. Mr. Lamb, whose own hobby is collecting antique glass, wires the bases, and Mrs. Lamb works out something original for the shade.

Mrs. Lamb started lamp-shade making in a small way three years ago when she was immobilized with a broken leg and no longer able to play golf. As friends and customers spread the word, she found herself in business, until now she has more than she can do.

The shop-studio addition replaces the original kitchen porch, extending far beyond its measurements. The huge end window lets in the light and the lawn and the fringes of woodland where woodchucks sit on their haunches to wolf the late peach crop, and squirrels flick up the tree after nuts.

The studio is in ivory, with spruce-green accents, and highlighted with shining copper pots. Everything is on ball-bearing castors, to permit touch-control, and at the proper height for standing or sitting on a high stool. John Fielding, contractor, worked things out as he went along.

Mrs. Lamb, still on crutches, but exceedingly agile, thinks her accident will probably turn out to be a modest gold-mine, though counting up the man-hours necessary for making a shade, she thinks nobody would ever exactly get rich custom-tailoring for a lamp.
