Warning Issued On Tularemia

(Release Thursday P.M.) Hunting season has started and Dr. Charles L. Wilbar, Jr., State Secretary of Health, issued a warning against one of the hazards of hunting-tularemia, better known as rabbit fever.

Tularemia, primarily a disease of rabbits and rodents, is one of the diseases easily transmitted from animals to man, Dr. Wilbar stated. The disease can be acquired through handling infected animals, by eating improperly cooked meat from infected animals, by drinking water contaminated by infected animals or being bitten by fleas, ticks or lice that have fed on tularemia-infected animals, Dr. Wilbar said.

Dr. Ernest J. Witte, chief, Vetrinary Public Health Section, Pennsylvania Health Department, reports that the illness starts three to five days after the germs have entered the human body and that its early signs are headache, fever and chills. He advises that a physician be consulted if these signs appear. Convalescence is long, according to Dr. Witte.
