DOGS ON FURNITURE

By Bob Bartos
Manager, Friskies Research Kennels

Should Fido be allowed on or off the furniture? Some owners give their dog free run of the house as if furniture while others believe that a dog's place is on the floor. A third, and in-between group, relegates one particular chair to their pet.

More owners would probably become members of this third group if they thought their dog could be made to distinguish between which is his chair and which isn't.

Actually, it's all a matter of training and the same principle applies to teaching your pet to keep off all furniture or all but a single piece. First, he must understand the meaning of the word "no" and owners must consistently give out with a firm "no" whenever the dog heads for forbidden furniture. Then, if your dog is to have the use of a chair, lead him to it and encourage him to jump up.

Dogs being creatures of habit, your pet should catch on quickly. Those that don't, however, and those that sneak up on a bed or sofa when everyone's out of the house may need further discipline.

The next time you're going to leave your dog alone, set mouse-traps on his favorite spot. When he jumps up on the sofa or bed, his weight hitting the mattress or cushion will spring the traps. This unexpected noise will startle your pet and it will be awhile before he'll venture back on forbidden territory. If your pet is so small that the trap might hurt him if he should touch it with nose, paw or tail, cover it with a newspaper.

Feeding Tip: Except for flat rib bones and large knuckle bones, don't give bones to dogs. The essential calcium needed in their diets can be easily and safely supplied by feeding your pet high-grade, all purpose dog food such as Friskies, which contains bone meal.
