It was one of those holidays when we should have stood in bed. Saturday night, the car conked out, making a feeble attempt to get out of the snow-choked driveway, and stopping dead in its tracks. (A week before, it had received a nice new battery in its Christmas stocking.)

With the time of arrival of the plane from Pittsburgh drawing closer and closer, and no way of getting to the airport to meet it, this power failure posed a problem. Have to tell Tom to take a taxi. to Dallas, grrr.

The phone. Avoca airport. "Guess what? You won't need to meet me. Jimmie Kozemchak is meeting young Jim, and he'll drop me off at the house on his way to Huntsville.'

So that hurdle was safely passed.

The following morning, with five inches more of the white stuff in the driveway, the car was still deader than a smelt. Half an hour later Clyde Birth's truck was in the driveway.

'You must have flooded it, Mrs. Hicks." Nope, guess again. I've been driving for thirty-five years, and if I flood, I know what to do. Take your foot off the pedal and see #### what happens." The car died.

Two men peered under the hood. One of them took off the air filter

And there was the automatic choke rod, dangling in mid-air. At the garage, a dingus resembling a paper clip grafted the rod to the works, and presto, the car obediently idled upon request. It also gave out with a surge of power which had been strangely missing for several days.

Back at the house: "Have you got your plane reservation for Washington?

"Nope, but I'll start working on it right after this cup of coffee." Eastern Airlines, Direct Flight; Allegheny Airlines, via Newark. Waiting list on both, Verify Monday morning.

Monday morning: "Sorry, can't let you know until noon at the est. Best we can do, could be we could get you on the 2 p.m.
