

Workmen At New High School Hampered By Frigid Weather

Workmen at the new Dallas High School are thawing out frozen fingers at portable kerosene heaters in the gymnasium wing section these cold days. In the classroom area, where it is colder inside the building than outside, one of the workmen is solving the problem of keeping warm by wearing padded Chinese underwear, which gives him an over-stuffed and cherubic look, but keeps him from freezing. He says he learned that stunt in Korea.

Construction is going forward under difficulties, but it is going forward.

With auditorium and gymnasium spaces, separated by a concrete stage, stretching vastly in both directions from the middle, and now under roof and with side walls enclosing it, it is possible to see what a mammoth structure the new senior high school is going to be.

Foundation for high bleachers is already in place. Light streams through windows high under the roof.

Workmen are dwarfed by the size of the wing.

In the classroom section, rooms are not yet separated from the rest of the space, but the location of partitions is marked out. Both classroom sections, surrounding an open court, give on the library.

The hill on which the school is rising, is higher than those on which College Misericordia and Dallas Junior High School are located. The library wing looks down upon both schools. John Jeter, Dallas Borough engineer, looking up the altitude on the geodetic survey map, places it at 1290 feet, with the height rising to 1300 on the higher ground behind the school.

Frank Jackson Instructs Club In Identification Of Trees

Frank Jackson was host to the Bird Club on Saturday. With temperatures in the forties, the day was fine for the outdoor hike to identify trees.

Mr. Jackson has a wide variety of trees on his rocky hillside at Harveys Lake. He showed members how to distinguish between species by bark and structure, then took them indoors to view specimens of nuts, and observe birds at the feeders.

The pileated woodpecker was not at home, but members saw the oak tree he had been working on. Some of the trees listed included Juneberry, pepperidge, catalpa, tulip, yellow poplar, shagbark, shellbark, pignut, leather tree, Norway spruce, beech, hemlock, white oak, basswood, black birch, butternut, cucumber.

Frank pointed out the spot where his treasured yellow ladyslippers bloom each spring, among the rocks on the hillside.

Members who gathered at the Jackson home were: Mrs. Arnott Jones, Mrs. Verna Weaver, Mrs. William James, Rev. George Deishee, John Conrad, Mrs. Elizabeth Davenport, Stewart Ferguson, Edwin Johnson, Basil Nichols, Ronnie Naveen and Terry Baltimore, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Pierce Jr.
