Not everyone is happy to have another personal birthday anniversary, but we believe that business anniversaries are always noted with a certain satisfaction, because they demonstrate that the firm has continued to serve well.

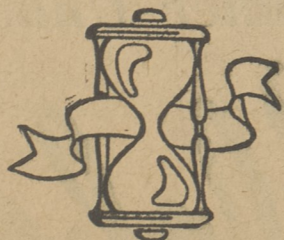

The individual, you see, continues to exist whether he's good or bad, useful or otherwise. With a business organization, this is not true; only a firm with policies which meet with public approval, and win public patronage, can hope to survive.

It is with real and understandable satisfaction, therefore that the Snowdon firm observes this, its twenty-fifth anniversary.
