

In Sumatra, Hunters Stalk Tigers And Elephants And Water Buffalo

Two young men from Indonesia spent several days in this area in January, working closely with Marvin Dymond, Fernbrook, who is with the Cleveland and Brothers Equipment Co. on the Ashley By-Pass.

The two boys, natives of Sumatra, were here on a six-weeks assignment from the Standard Vacuum Co. to study caterpillar tractors and large earth moving machinery. They are now spending another six-weeks hitch at Grove City, studying more earth movers. When they get back to Sumatra in April, they will utilize their new skills in teaching other young men.

Kelli Setiaprada and Bastian Burhan learned basic English in school, a required subject in Sumatra, so were able to communicate without too great trouble. As Bastian said to Mrs. Dymond, it sounds different over here, and you have to talk with natives to really learn a language.

Kelli and Bastian, both in their very early twenties, found the natives delightful. Mrs. Dymond had a bad moment when she discovered that her dinner guests, being Mohammedan, were forbidden to eat ham, but she had time to sidetrack it, rush down to the Acme, and buy broiling chickens as a substitute. The boys, living in a motel near Ashley, were glad to eat a few home-cooked meals, and were lyrical about broiled chicken.

They both expect to be back for a few days about the Grove City assignment and this time they will stay with the Dymonds. They are homesick kids, Bastian expecting his first son early in May, Kelli a bride two weeks after they were married. Kelli will have a jungle assignment where he must cross the equator each day going to and from his work.

The boys asked about hunting in the Back Mountain. Tales of deer, rabbits, squirrels and a partidge sounded tame to them.

In Sumatra, they hunt tigers, and elephants, and water buffalo.
