Angleworms Are Big Business Rabbits Contribute To Culture

Making headlines with his angleworms in the Buffalo Courier-Express, is a former Dallas carpenter, who finds that a combination of rabbitry and angle-worm breeding pits is highly profitable.

William Clifford Price has a system. He locates his angleworm pits, directly beneath his rabbit hutch. The warmth from the rabbits helps keep the worms from freezing in severe weather, and the output of the rabbits is highly nourishing, mixed with chopped straw as a mulch.

The lights which burn all night above the angleworm pits delude the worms into thinking it is bright sunshine outside, and they remain securely buried in the dirt until spaded out. When a bucketful of angleworm-bearing earth is spread on a slab, in the sunshine, the worms again make a nose-dive for the dark. This permits Mr. Price, or Mrs. Price, or one of the seven lesser Prices, to brush off the dirt and uncover the worms for counting and packing.

This winter, Mr. Price sent one large shipment to Maine for laboratory purposes, and they froze en route... but they were insured.

He has a number of different varieties in his concrete breeding pits, among them a startling bluish purple item from Africa as thick as a finger.

Angleworms are big business. The Price place on Tonawanda Creek at Indian Falls near Buffalo, is strategically located near a lake which attracts many fishermen. On the way in, they stop and pick up their bait from Mr. Price.

There is a steady market for angleworms from farmers and horticulturists, and for scientific research. There is also a market for rabbits from scientific laboratories. While the rabbits are attaining enough size to be sent to the biological laboratory, they are contributing to the angleworm culture.

Bill, now 37, lived at Demunds when he was a boy. Later he farmed at Pikes Creek and at Noxen. When stationed in Hawaii (he was there when the Japanese planes struck on December 7, 1941) his dream was to buy a little place and raise angleworms. The rabbits were an afterthought.

He is a carpenter. While in this area he worked for a number of construction firms in Greater Wyoming Valley and in Williamsport. He left in 1954. His present employment is with the Chevrolet Company at Tonawanda near Buffalo, where he is a millwright, occupied with leveling large machinery.

Mrs. Price is the former Lois Bryant of Center Moreland, who was educated at local schools and College Misericordia. Their seven children range in age from three to
