

If It Isn't Bees Or Wild Canaries, It's A Porcupine Out At Dugan's

Never a dull moment at the Paul Dugan's home. If it isn't bees in the clapboards, nest dogs, stray cats, or canaries flitting about in the basement it's a porcupine in the cellar.

Tuesday night around 11:30 Mrs. Dugan heard a noise down in the cellar. She and Paul took a flashlight and investigated.

There, crouched on a shelf of the preserve closet, and looking down at a jar of peaches smashed on the stone floor, was a large porcupine, moaning like a small puppy and bristling his quills.

Mrs. Dugan had heard that porcupines cast their quills. Playing it safe, she kept well away from the porcupine, though her first impulse was to stroke it because it looked so frightened.

A look at her wrist watch convinced her that it was a little too late to call the Dallas Post for information about porcupines.

"It was a sure enough whooper," Mrs. Dugan said later, must have been at least two feet long. It was almost too much. Just a couple days before, there'd been a couple of wild canaries down there, flying within an inch of my hair."

Paul propped the high cellar window open with a piece of two-by-four, and started persuading the porcupine to back up along the stone ledge. Paul did his persuading by remote control, advancing as the porcupine retreated. When it reached the windowsill and scented freedom, Paul took a snapshot.

"Lucky you didn't pat it," the Dallas Post said after it was all over. Porcupines don't shoot their quills, but those quills are very lightly attached, and they let go at a touch, just like getting your skirt full of stickers when you skurt against a plant of beggar's lice.

"And just be thankful it wasn't a rattlesnake," the Dallas Post added. "A few years ago, a woman out near Evans Falls went down cellar to get a jar of peaches, and there, coiled tightly around the jar was a large rattler. The family did NOT have peaches for supper. Somehow, they'd all lost their appetite."
