The Coo In The Flue

It wasn't an owl, nor a "hant" in the chimney at the Library Annex Tuesday morning. It was a brace of pigeons cooing comfortably under the protective concrete slab capping the brick chimney, the open flue acting like a sounding board. Don Weidner erected a tall ladder and apprehended the culprits.

"Cut the coo in the flue, shoo," he advised, with a flap of his hand. The pigeons took off.

Illinois Man Seeks Information About Civil War Grandfathers

Dear Howard:

Enclosed is check for the Dallas Post for another year.

We were in Noxen a few days but were unable to see you, so will try again on our next trip East.

Both of my grandfathers were in the Civil War and if you can find anything concerning their records, I would be glad to have it.

Harry Osborn was a Sergeant in Company K, 106th Pennsylvania Volunteers. This is taken from the stone in Dimmock, Susquehanna County, Cemetery. On the Pennsylvania Monument at Gettysburg his name seems to be Henry Osborn. I have been told that he enlisted while on a hunting trip in western Pennsylvania.

The other is Miles F. Newberry, Company F, 53rd Pennsylvania Infantry as taken from the monument in Beaumont Cemetery.

Yours very truly Harry Osborn

Dear Harry:

Both of your grandfathers were in one of the toughest fighting units in the Civil War—The Second Corps commanded by a great Pennsylvanian, Mayor General Winfield Scott Hancock, who was born in Norristown, Pa., and Brig. General John Gibbon, another favorite.

This Corps saw more action and lost more men than any Corps in the Army of the Potomac.

One of seven Federal Corps at Gettysburg, the Second was composed of 13,000 men divided into three Divisions. The First Division made up of four Brigades, was commanded by Brig. Gen. John C. Caldwell.

Your grandfather Miles F. Newberry, served with Company F, 53rd Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, in the Fourth Brigade commanded by Col. John R. Brooke. Commander of the 53rd Regiment was Lieut. Col. Richards McMichael. Other regiments fighting beside your grandfather in the Fourth Brigade were 27th Connecticut; 2nd Delaware; 64th New York and 145 Pennsylvania.

The 53rd lost eleven enlisted men; 11 officers and 56 enlisted men wounded and 6 enlisted men captured or missing at Gettysburg.

The Second Corps was not engaged in the first days fighting on July 1st at Gettysburg, but was encamped about two miles from the field that night at 10. The following day it arrived on the field at 7 a.m. and went into position on Cemetery Ridge about one mile north of Little Round Top, where there was little action until about 4 p.m., when the Fourth Brigade was ordered to the assistance of General Dan Sickles' Third Corps, going into battle line at the edge of the wheat field on the double-quick. Enemy artillery fire was talking a heavy toll. The Brigade gallantly responded, and dashing forward broke the enemy's second line and mounting the high ground beyond the Run, drove the enemy's artillery from its position. It was in this charge and at this time that the 53rd Pennsylvania reached the identical spot now marked by its monument.

This monument is surmounted by a mustached infantryman in full marching equipment, rifle in hand, bayonet affixed, and wearing an overcoat. I'm sure none of them wore overcoats during those hot July days in 1863 and why the soldier on the monument wears one is beyond me.

The regiment had advanced so far and was so strongly assailed by forces on both flanks that it was forced to retire, and none too soon because it was almost enveloped before it reached and repassed the wheatfield where it reformed behind stone walls. It being then about 7 p.m. and the fighting for the day practically over, it reformed on Cemetery Ridge where it dug rifle pits.

It saw little action on July 3rd when Pickett's main charge was some distance to its right. Neither the regiment nor the Brigade was directly engaged, but the skirmish

Hurled Violently From Bicycle, Head Injured

An eight-year old Trucksville boy, suffering from severe concussion when hurled from his bicycle on Bunker Hill Road August 7, remains at Nesbitt Hospital. Frank Oatridge Jr. regained consciousness briefly the following morning, and lapsed again into a stupor. Late reports are that he is now doing well.

Frank, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Oatridge, Carverton Road, apparently caught his foot in the spokes on a down-grade. The area, scrutinized by Assistant Chief Jess Coslett, showed no sign of skid marks indicating a hit-run accident.

The boy, bleeding and unconscious, was taken by a passing motorist to Trucksville Fire House, then to Dr. Richard Crompton's office. Dr. Crompton called Kingston Township ambulance for the trip to Nesbitt.
