Cancer Survey To Start Soon

One In Eighty-Eight
Will Be Interviewed

One in 88 Pennsylvanians will soon be checked on to see if he is still alive.

If he is, the American Cancer Society volunteer researcher who calls will ask him to fill out a confidential form telling how he has been the past two years, whether he smokes, and whether he lives or works in polluted air.

If he has died in the past year, his death certificate will be checked for cause of death. If cancer was the cause, his doctor will be asked for specific information on the type and progress of the disease.

These questions and answers about the state of health of 98,922 people in the Pennsylvania Division (all of the state except Philadelphia and Montgomery counties) are part of the second-year checkup on 1,100,000 Americans who are subjects of an epidemiological survey by the American Cancer Society.

Researchers in Luzerne county will check on and give questionnaires to 2838 people in the county. Their headquarters will be the American Cancer Society Unit office in Wilkes-Barre.

Called the Cancer Prevention Survey, the six-year study will give facts never before available showing how family history, foods, smoking and air pollution are related to cancer. Scientists hope to get clues from these facts which will lead to earlier finding of cancer, and ways of preventing the disease.

Volunteer researchers -- 6,212 of them in the Pennsylvania Division--will start October 1 to make this second annual checkup. Preliminary work is being done now at the Pennsylvania Division and local American Cancer Society Unit offices to prepare for the survey. IBM cards with the names of each person in the survey are going to county offices now, and kits are being prepared for researchers.

The largest epidemiological study ever attempted, the ACS Cancer Prevention Survey was made financially possible only by the fact that volunteer researchers originally distributed the survey questionnaires, and are making the annual checkups the Society said today.

New Program Offered At Senary Day School

Kenneth C. MacArthur, headmaster of Wyoming Seminary Day School, announces that beginning with the 1961 term a new program in French, Latin, and mathematics will be offered so a student who starts in the seventh grade will be able to earn a year's high school credit in these subjects by the end of the eighth grade.

In connection with this program and in better preparing the student for participation in the French course, conversational French will be started next fall in the third grade. By the fifth grade the student will begin more formal instruction in the language and will move into a regular high school French course in the seventh grade.

Latin will be first offered in the eighth grade. Since this is not a conversational language, the administration feels it wiser to postpone introducing Latin until the student has a good grasp of English grammar.

The arithmetic curriculum is being revised to allow the students to complete the Elementary Algebra course by the time of graduation from Day School.

All of this will give a student opportunity to obtain advanced standing in three fields on entering high school.

With this advantage, he will be able to start work toward preparation for advanced standing examination for college.

Many public independent high schools offer their students a chance to work toward advanced placement in their senior year. To do this, preparation must begin in the elementary school, and the Day School wants its graduates prepared to take advantage of this advanced program, according to the headmaster.
