

Crows And Woodpeckers Help Check Corn Borers

At least half of the Commonwealth's European corn borer population did not survive the winter. Field checks conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry, State Department of Agriculture, credit woodpeckers and crows with much of the pest destruction. Over-wintering borers will soon change into the parent moth stage and eggs will be laid on early corn and, in some instances, on potatoes. Farmers are urged to rake and burn or completely plow under corn stalks and thick stemmed weeds as preventive steps in controlling borers. A survey made last fall indicated that borers were not quite as abundant in Pennsylvania in 1961 as the previous year, but there was less reduction in the over-wintering population because of the heavy protective snows.
