

Rev. Frick's Pictures

Wild flags on the shore of Huntsville Reservoir, below Rev. Charles Frick's house in Huntsville. Taken with the morning mist still rising from the water, wild orchids in the foreground.

These sleepy babies are not chicks. Far from it. The downy little creatures, clinging to the roughness of a stump, are newly hatched ruffed grouse. In posing the picture, Rev. Charles Frick tried time and again to get both babies balanced, but one or the other dropped off and had to be rescued.

The woods used to be full of them, but the pink lady's slipper is now a rarity, surviving only in areas far from main traveled highways, safe from greedy clutching hands that pluck, only to discard when the delicate blossoms wither. This cypripedium is difficult to naturalize, as it is a biennial, blossoming the second year, then disappearing.

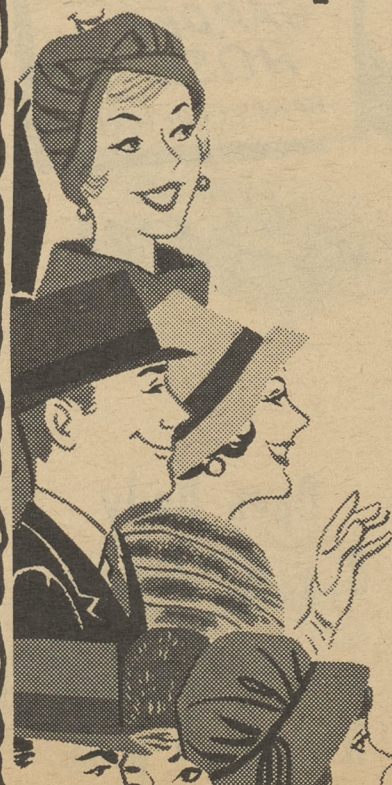

Soon the hillsides will be rosy with pink azalea, Mountain Honeysuckle.

Osmunda fern huddles close to the grateful coolness of a damp rock, dripping with moisture. In a much enlarged version, featuring the cool rock centrally placed, the composition suggests a mural developed in silver grey, black and white.
