IT'S EASY TO GET MORE FROM YOUR GARDEN

by Dr. Peter Asgrow

CONSTRUCTING A LAWN FOR PERMANENT BEAUTY

Nothing, nothing whatever, means so much to the garden as good green grass. In fact a garden may be regarded as a lawn with floral borders and suitable shrubs or trees. The house, too, is enhanced in appearance by the pleasing green setting, just as a picture is by a harmonious frame. Care in making and maintaining a lawn is amply repaid.

A lawn should last as long as its house. Both are meant to endure and will do so if they are properly constructed at the outset. A house will not stand up without a good foundation and no more will a lawn, but some houses are hundreds of years old and so are some lawns.

We begin with the soil. There are two main divisions of it in your garden and everywhere else — topsoil, in which life and fertility are concentrated; and below it the subsoil, very deep but relatively lifeless and inert. If the subsoil is largely sand and gravel, it will drain away superfluous water, but if it should be clay, so that pools of rain water stand on the surface, you may need to have drains laid which to spread for plant food and water, and to get a good hold on the soil for anchorage. A depth of six to eight inches is even better. This may mean that you will have to add some topsoil. If so, be sure to get it from a reliable source. Old pasture land is good, being likely to be fairly free from weeds, or you may buy some from a commercial nursery, but beware of the itinerant truck with a load of "black dirt" which may have come out of a swamp. Next find out if the topsoil is acid — or sour — as most old soils usually are, since lawn grasses make poor progress in sour soil. This condition can't be told by sight, touch or smell but is readily detected by a simple test. Your garden supply center will either do it for you or tell you how to get it done. Lime corrects acidity, and even if you skip the test you will probably not be far wrong in applying 50 pounds of ground limestone per 1,000 sq. ft. Ground limestone in this form is slower acting but longer lasting than hydrated lime, of which you need only half as much. Another good effect of lime is in conditioning the soil, helping it to have a smooth texture and a little, a very little, supplies the plants with calcium. Spread the lime evenly all over the surface before you start to dig. The best way to do this is with a two-wheeled lawn spreader, which you will find a profitable investment as you will need it also for seeding and will be using it regularly, later on, for spreading lawn fertilizer.
